The lake was not very deep, but it s over a man's head at that point of t boat landing where the girls stood. Miss Mason knew it would be over l head if she attempted to walk out t the struggling girl. She could not sim. She glanced around agonizingly f something to throw to her. The pe on the baskets was too short. ere was nothing.

Suddenly she spied a loose board in t landing.

"Help me, quick!" she cried to the ls.

Together they wrenched it loose and shed it out over the water.

Fatty rose to the surface just be- nd the plank.

"Catch it; oh, catch it, Fatty!" im- l red Miss Mason.

"Catch it, Fatty!" screamed the ls.

But Fatty was too far gone to hear or to understand. She sank again.

"Oh, what shall we do?" murmured Miss Mason in agony.

"Help! Help!" screamed the girls in chorus.

Augusta's voice rose above them all.

There was a rushing, puffing sound back of them. It came from the road which led to the boat landing. A motor-cycle was flying along the road. It stopped. A man sprang from it and rushed down the landing, past them, and into the water. Fatty had risen for the last time. Rapidly he swam toward the drowning girl. Just as he reached out his hand for her, she sank. The man dived quickly. The watchers held their breath. An awful second of suspense, and then he rose to the surface, holding the girl tightly in one arm, while he tried to propel them both by the other. It was not an easy task. Fatty was a dead weight, and a heavy one. Panting, he reached the landing, and, clinging to it with one hand, he lifted the unconscious girl up to the boards, then climbed up himself.

"Dr. Barclay!" gasped Miss Mason.

"Help me," he ordered, tersely, as the girls clustered around poor Fatty with white, awe-stricken faces.

Panting from his mighty exertion, and dripping wet, yet with no thought of himself, the doctor worked over the girl. To all appearances life was extinct; but, after working bravely for a while, with the help of Miss Mason and the girls, Fatty slowly came back to life.

"She'll be all right now, if she doesn't get cold from her wetting," said the doctor, heaving a great sigh of relief, and leaning for a moment wearily against a post.

"How did you happen to come along just when we needed you?" asked Miss Mason, recovering from the excitement and suspense.

"One of my patients has moved a mile or so beyond here, and I rode through the park on my way home. But how did you come here, and who are these girls?" The young man looked about him in astonishment.

"They belong to Elizabeth Lloyd's class at the settlement house. She had promised them a picnic this afternoon, but is ill with a cold. She prevailed on me to come as her substitute."

"You? I thought you said——"

"I know," she answered, more humbly than he had ever heard her speak before, or ever thought she could speak. "I know—I said a lot of things I am sorry for now. I didn't see how you could take such an interest in settlement work—I didn't think I ever could—I didn't know. I have learned lots of things this afternoon. I have changed my mind about many things."

"Have you?" rang out the doctor's voice, eagerly. He looked at her quickly, searchingly, and a great light came into his eyes. He forgot the girls. He saw only Miss Mason, rosy and blushing, and she—she forgot the girls, too.

The doctor recovered himself and said, in a tone meant to be professional, but from which he could not keep the happy ring:

"These girls must get home at once. I will see you safely to the car."

They hurriedly gathered up the baskets and wended their way to the car. The girls clambered in, tired but happy.

The motorcycle with its rider whizzed along beside the car. It was hard to tell which of all the party was the happiest.

But the girls little knew what the chance meeting and the rescue meant to the fair young girl who had them in charge and the man who, by his timely arrival, had saved the life of one of their number.

The Serious Side of Foods Shot from Guns

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are so enticing that they hardly seem like scientific foods.

These crisp, porous grains—eight times natural size—are becoming the cereal sensations. Half a million meals of Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are now served every day.

They are eaten because people delight in them—because the grains are like nuts—because they melt in the mouth.

But, lest you forget, let us remind you again of the real reason for these foods.

A Doctor's Advice

A friend told us this: "A few days ago I consulted a famous physician regarding a stomach trouble. And I was fairly amazed when the advice that I got was to eat Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice.

"I regarded these foods as a sort of cereal confection. The baby of our house delights in them. But to have a great physician advise them as a diet was a novel idea to me.

"But he explained that these foods contained all the grain value—all the food elements needed.

"He said—as you say—that the steam explosion breaks the starch granules to pieces, so the digestive juices act instantly. Cooking, baking or toasting can't do this as well.

"The result is two whole grain foods—the world's premier foods—so wonderfully prepared that they don't tax the stomach. So he advised them for my principal diet."

Prof. Anderson's Idea

That was the original object—the sole idea—of this curious process, invented by Prof. Anderson.

The whole kernels of grain are put into sealed guns. Then the guns are revolved for sixty minutes in a heat of 550 degrees.

That heat turns the moisture in the grain to steam, and the pressure becomes tremendous. Then the guns are suddenly unsealed, the steam explodes, and every starch granule is literally blasted to pieces.

The grains are puffed to eight times their natural size. But the coats are unbroken, the shapes are unaltered. These crisp, giant grains are more digestible than any other cereal food.

How to Serve

Serve with sugar and cream, if you wish. Or mix them with fruit. Bananas or berries mixed with Puffed Wheat form a delightful blend.

Or serve them, like crackers, in a bowl of milk. Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are as crisp as crackers and four times as porous as bread.

Serve them any time—at mealtimes, between meals or bedtime. There is no harm in eating at any hour these easily digested foods.

Serve them tomorrow—order them now. For your folks are missing ideal foods when they lack Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice.

LOVE AND LAW

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"IS it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar?" "Whose wife shall she be in the resurrection?" "Which is the great commandment?"

The first of the three foregoing questions was put to Jesus by the Pharisees and the Herodians. The second was asked by the Sadducees. The third was asked by a lawyer of the Herodians. And there was a fourth question put by Jesus himself.

The Sadducees, Pharisees and Herodians did not ask questions of Jesus because they desired information, but because they wished to entrap him. If we know the character of these men we shall not wonder at their sinister purpose. The Sadducees were the aristocrats of their day. They attached themselves to the priests, particularly to the high priests, and they largely composed the Sanhedrin, the Supreme Court of the Jews. Whatever beliefs they may have had, they had one unbelief: they did not believe in the resurrection of the dead.

The Parties in Jerusalem

The Pharisees were far more numerous than the Sadducees, and not of such high rank, because they attached themselves to the scribes instead of to the priests. They were the law party, going far beyond the law of God as given by Moses. They thus put heavy burdens upon men, and made serving God anything but a delight.

The Herodians were a small political party who had gathered about King Herod, when he was ruler in Palestine. They were hated both by the Pharisees and the Sadducees. But once, at least, the Pharisees made common cause with them, when they tried to entrap Jesus by questions.

The Sadducees asked their question because they knew that according to the law of Moses it was the custom for a man to marry the widow of a brother, or even of brothers; and they thought that Jesus must either condemn the law or deny the resurrection. In a single sentence Jesus showed them that a law concerning marriage on earth was not applicable to heaven. They wanted Jesus to declare himself an opponent to the law. They were continually bringing this charge against him, although Jesus had said that he came not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfil them. And the Sadducees were silenced by Jesus' reply. Possibly they were made to feel that they must let God know some things which they could not know.

The Question of Tribute

The Pharisees asked their question about the tribute money because they wished to entangle Jesus with the Roman authorities. Their question, "Is it lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar?" was most pernicious, for if Jesus had said, "Yes," it would have aroused the whole body of the Jews against him. Tribute was such a hateful thing to them that some of the strictest among them would not carry about their persons the denarius, a coin which had on it the image of Cæsar; but they must use it in paying taxes, when they went directly to the money-changers for it. If Jesus had answered "No" to their question it would have aroused the Roman authorities against him. And so it appears that Jesus could answer neither yes nor no. He wisely made them answer their own question. And this he did by requesting that a denarius (penny) should be brought to him. It was not a cent, but a coin worth about seventeen cents.

It had the head of Cæsar on one sid with the inscription, "Tiberius Cæsa the son of the deified Augustus, hin self Augustus." On the other side wa the image of the deified Augustu himself, with the inscription Ponti Maxim.—the greatest of all ruler Put in contrast with this the Jewis half shekel. On one side, the word "Half shekel" and the laver; and o the other, "Jerusalem Holy" and th three flowers, representing the Goo head. Only such a coin, or the sheke which was similar in design, could b used to pay tribute to God in th temple service.

The Great Commandment

Verily, the Pharisees had asked hard question of Jesus. When the coi he had requested was brought to hi he reminded them of their constant us of it in matters of trade, and the uttered the principle that if they use Cæsar's money, they were in dut bound to pay tribute to him. "Rende unto Cæsar the things that a Cæsar's." This principle was after ward put into the Talmud, the Jewis commentary on the law, in the words "If a king's coin is current in a cour try, the men of that country do thereb evidence that they acknowledge hi their lord." (Not their God, but thei ruler.)

There was a stinging rebuke in th added words of Jesus: "Render unt God the things that are God's." The had done the first, because they must they had not done the last, because th Lord regards only those who serv him with a willing heart. And so th Pharisees were silenced.

Then a lawyer of the Herodian asked the question:

"Which is the great commandment? This question was probably not sug gested by the Herodians themselve but grew out of the interest of an in dividual. But certainly the Pharisee were interested in it. We can bu wonder what answer they expecte Jesus to give, knowing what we o about their strict observance of th Sabbath, for they taught men tha they should not carry a handkerchie on the Sabbath, or wear shoes that ha nails in them, because it would b "carrying burdens on the Sabbath." But if Jesus had replied, "the fourt commandment," they probably woul have charged him with idolatry, wit the worship of the day, rather than o the God who made the day. The law yer's question was one which was ofte discussed among the Jews. The Pha isees certainly interpreted the whol law in a tyrannical way. In his repl Jesus gave the true interpretatio He set forth its benign principle o love: first, love to God; and secon love to man.

The Fulfilling of the Law

Love is the fulfilling of the law. I loving God we fulfil the first four com mandments: We honor him as Go and him only; we do not speak irrev erently of him, and we honor his da In loving men we neither desire thei possessions, nor will we seek to mak ours that which is theirs; we will neve speak ill of them, or lie about them and above all we will honor those wh gave us being. When God first gav the commandments from Mount Sina he gave them in love, as a covenant b tween God and man. He told Moses t tell the Hebrews that he was to b their God, and they were to be h people, and they were to show thei loyalty to him in the ways indicate in the law. And God gave the law t the Hebrews for the whole world. A man-made laws have drawn their bas of equity from the law as given o Sinai. And it may also be said tha the keeping of all law is based upo he thought of love as set forth in that covenant-law, for no one will obey that which he hates, but will have instead the spirit of the anarchist. So that Jesus in his reply to the question of the Pharisees only reiterated what had been said by God in the beginning.

The lawyer who asked the question, "Which is the greatest commandment?" was well satisfied with the answer which Jesus gave, for he said to Jesus, "Of a truth thou hast well said." It has been suggested that the lawyer was an honest seeker after truth. Evidently his question was of his own initiative.

The Wherefore of Our Love for God

Dr. George H. Pentecost has said: "Nowhere in the New Covenant or the Gospel is a believer commanded to love God, and the question naturally arises: But is it not the duty of the believer to love God? As I understand it I would not put it so. One can hardly love another as a matter of duty. Love, in the nature of it, must be spontaneous. It cannot be forced or compelled, for any emotion which is manifested toward God or man under compulsion, or as a mere discharge of obligation, cannot be love. One cannot love another by trying to do so. There is no doubt an eternal obligation upon all men to love God, but it must be forever an undischarged obligation so far as the unregenerated and unreconciled man is concerned. And when a man is reconciled to God through our Lord Jesus Christ, he does not love as a duty, but because he cannot help it. 'Love is the mark of the new birth.'" "Love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not, knoweth not God; for God is love" (I. John 4: 7, 8).

Love to Our Fellow-Men

In the Bible we are told that if we love not our brethren, the love of God is not in us; and also that we manifest our love for God by loving others, not only in word, but in deed.

"Do you see the churchyard up yonder, children?" said old Jem. "There is the grave of a brave man up there, and he was my Sunday School teacher for many years; and if you will sit down beside me, I will tell you how he died." And they all gathered around Jem, and sat down on the grass, and looked with wonder into his face. Jem began his story:

"Everybody in our village knew John Holmes. He gathered a lot of us boys in his carpenter shop on Sunday afternoons. He taught us a little reading, and then we sang some hymns, and after that he talked to us. He never was tired of telling us about the love of Jesus. It all seemed so real to him that once when he was telling us about heaven and Jesus being there, a little chap stood up and said: 'And did you really see all that yourself? Did Jesus give you a peep inside?' One Sunday he taught us as usual, and on the Monday night after there was a strong gale blowing out at sea. The fishermen used to go out on stormy nights, and try to help poor people who were wrecked on the rocks. John Holmes had sometimes helped in saving drowning people. Well, that night we heard guns fired, and saw lights burning, so we knew there was a ship in distress; so out went the Seagull, carrying brave hearts and kind hands to help the poor creatures. But twice our men had to turn back, for the sea was so rough they could not get near the rocks. The second time they came back some of them came ashore, and said it was impossible for them to go out again. But Captain Tom said, 'As long as there's any hope of saving lives I shall go; and I know, mates, you won't let old Captain Tom go by himself! A man stepped forward to go—the father of one of our Sunday School boys; but John Holmes went up to him and said: 'You have a wife and little children at home, but John Holmes' wife and children are in heaven; let him go in your place. At first Captain Tom objected, because he feared John Holmes was not as good a seaman as a fisherman, but finally he consented when John Holmes said, 'Don't fear I'll turn coward.' And then he turned to us and said, 'Good-by, boys; if your teacher does not come back, remember he'll look out to meet you all in heaven. If death comes to me to-day, thank God I'm ready to meet it.' And off they went. We stood on the shore waiting for them to come back. While we watched they came, and some one from the shore shouted: 'All safe aboard?' 'Seven lives saved,' came back the answer from Captain Tom, 'but we've left the best of the lot behind. Let us get these poor things off and then we will go back and get John Holmes off the rocks.' The Seagull was quickly unloaded, and started back. We were told by some of the men that Captain Tom had said that the seven extra men would be too heavy for the boat, and that John Holmes had insisted on staying behind. 'I'm a big weight,' he said; 'go you quickly back and then come here again. Please God, you'll find me sitting on this rock; if not, I shall only have gone to my heavenly home by a short road.'

"I can't tell you much more," said Jem with tears in his eyes; "they only brought back John's body, which they found washed up by the sea. As Captain Tom gently spread a blanket on the sand on which to lay it, he said, 'John was ready for death.' So you don't wonder that I said, 'There is the grave of a very brave man.'" And then the children took Jem's hands and asked him to take them close beside the grave and in their little hearts was planted the Christlike thought of loving and helping others.

ADVERTISING HAS IMPROVED THE WORLD

NO dishonest advertiser nowadays lasts long commercially. Any man who has the appearance of making money is closely watched, and he soon has competition; it does not take long for his competitors to uncover any crookedness. Here is where advertising does its work.

Suppose Brown tries to sell you a worthless umbrella for $2. Green sees how weak Brown is, and starts to advertise a special make of honest value umbrellas, guaranteed to give satisfaction, at the same price. The guaranty of the honest man will get the trade every time, and Brown must reform or go out of business. Whichever he does you are benefited. Advertising frauds are soon discovered.

Again, supposing three merchants start to sell the same article. The publisher asks all three to advertise. Two do not advertise because they know the other one to be dishonest. The publisher soon finds it out, and refuses to carry the dishonest advertising. That is one way in which you are protected by publishers, who never tire in their efforts to kill fraudulent advertising.

No merchant can continue to advertise in a reputable paper unless he is honest in his dealings.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD carries only such advertisers as it can guarantee to be worthy of your patronage. Look through this issue and note the reputable houses that favor us with their patronage.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

"NO FRILLS"

Just Sensible Food Cured Him.

Sometimes a good, healthy commercial traveler suffers from poorly selected food and is lucky if he learns that Grape-Nuts food will put him right.

A Cincinnati traveler says: "About a year ago my stomach got in a bad way. I had a headache most of the time and suffered misery. For several months I ran down until I lost about 70 pounds in weight and finally had to give up a good position and go home. Any food that I might use seemed to nauseate me.

"My wife, hardly knowing what to do, one day brought home a package of Grape-Nuts food and coaxed me to try it. I told her it was no use, but, finally, to humor her, I tried a little and they just struck my taste. It was the first food that I had eaten in nearly a year that did not cause any suffering.

"Well, to make a long story short, I began to improve and stuck to Grape-Nuts. I went up from 135 pounds in December to 194 pounds the following October.

"My brain is clear, blood all right and appetite too much for any man's pocketbook. In fact, I am thoroughly made over and owe it all to Grape-Nuts. I talk so much about what Grape-Nuts will do that some of the men on the road have nicknamed me 'Grape-Nuts,' but I stand to-day a healthy, rosy-cheeked man—a pretty good example of what the right kind of food will do.

"You can publish this if you want to. It is a true statement without any frills."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

A Chance To Earn More!

IT is estimated that a city of 10,000 spends about $5,000 a year for magazines. 30% of that amount ($1,500) is paid to certain persons who secure some of these subscriptions for the publishers. These amounts vary according to the population.

The Magazine business, therefore, offers unusual opportunities for Men and Women, Boys and Girls, Ministers, Sunday School Teachers and all others who desire to increase their incomes.

Why not control part of the subscription business of your community? It is clean, dignified work, and the best people are now engaged in it.

The Christian Herald is organizing an entirely new agency staff. This live Weekly has never before offered such liberal inducements for this class of work, and the possibilities are really unlimited.

Just think of the large number of people who could be induced to subscribe for The Christian Herald! A little effective work, carefully followed up, would in time enable you to "corner" most of the subscription business of your territory, which would net you a permanent profit aside from your other endeavors. There is no expense—we send everything free. Only spare time required.

THE HOWARD WATCH

There will be no more Howards as low as $37.50, except the limited number now in the dealers' hands. The increasing demand for our better watches compels us to stop making this grade and concentrate on the finer movements.

On February 1st, of this year, we had to discontinue the $35.00 Howard as we announced at that time, and on June 15th we made the last of the $37.50 quality. These are both excellent watches.

The $35.00 watch sold out so fast that many people were disappointed. They didn't see the jeweler soon enough. It will be the same with the $37.50 if those who desire them do not act quickly.

See your jeweler at once, there will never be another Howard made at $37.50

This watch is 17-jewel single roller escapement, tested in its case at the factory—adjusted to three positions, temperature and isochronism—in hunting case only.

We wish it clearly understood that this is not a raise in price of Howard watches. It means that we have to increase our production of the finer watches and we can't do that by hurrying the work. In 65 years of watch making history a Howard has never been slighted.

Every year there are more men who want to own a Howard—never quite enough to go around.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached.

Not every jeweler can sell you a Howard watch. No jeweler can charge you more than the printed ticket calls for and the Howard is always worth that price.

Talk to the Howard jeweler in your town—he is a good man to know.

MANY DOLLARS SAVED IN BUILDING

Write for FREE Samples and Booklet Describing

BISHOPRIC WALL BOARD AND SHEATHING

Bishopric Wall Board is cheaper and better than Lath and Plaster; also saves time in building.

This practical substitute for lath and plaster is easily nailed to studding. Being applied dry, it is at once ready for paint, paper or burlap. Saves time and labor; is clean and sanitary; guaranteed

Proof Against Dampness, Heat, Cold, Sound, Vermin

Bishopric Wall Board is made of kiln-dried dressed lath, IMBEDDED in hot Asphalt Mastic, and surfaced with sized cardboard; is cut at the factory into uniform sheets 4x4 ft. sq. and three-eighths of an inch thick. These sheets (delivered in crates) are easily and quickly nailed to studding ready for wall paper, paint or burlap.

ITS MANY USES: — Bishopric Wall Board is used for dwellings, pleasure, health resort and factory buildings, new partitions in old buildings, finishing attics, cellars, porches, laundries, garages.

Price $2.50 per 100 sq. ft. or $6.40 per crate of 256 sq. ft. f. o. b. factories, New Orleans, Cincinnati, or Alma, Mich.

Bishopric Sheathing saves 75 per cent. in material and labor. Ideal for frame or cement buildings.

Bishopric Sheathing is both better and cheaper than lumber. It is the same material as Wall Board, but finish is not necessarily so fine; therefore costs less. Quickly nailed to studs with laths and asphalt exposed, forming dead air space between laths and weather boards. Makes smoother and more solid job than lumber; no holes, no shrinking. Proof against heat, cold and dampness.

For Cement or Stucco Work

Bishopric Sheathing has no equal in economy and satisfactory results. Space between laths forms excellent key for cement. Moisture cannot penetrate asphalt body of Sheathing. Our FREE booklet explains everything.

Bishopric Sheathing also is used with excellent results as cheapest and best lining for dairy barns, poultry houses, stables and all other outdoor buildings.

Price $2 per square of 100 sq. ft. or $5.12 per crate of 256 sq. ft. f. o. b. New Orleans, Cincinnati, or Alma, Mich.

Evangelizing the Immigrant

By George A. Sanford, Secretary, Army Branch, Y. M. C. A.

FEW native Americans recognize the far-reaching influences we exert in preaching the Gospel to the foreigners who are flocking to our shores. They come so quietly and unobtrusively that we hardly realize their presence except in the large centres. However, their presence will be to our country either a menace or a great opportunity. If they do not become assimilated and trained to American ideals, our country will become Europeanized; but on the other hand, their presence makes one of the greatest of opportunities for evangelization ever given to any people. One hardly realizes this fact until absent abroad. For instance, in Great Britain in a church or street audience probably ninety-five per cent. will be native-born; here in New York, especially in street meetings, the ratio of native born Americans would probably not be over twenty per cent. It is not simply a question of reaching these people who listen to us, but the influences also reach back to the homes of these aliens in the old country.

In an interesting pamphlet, entitled, "The Evangelization Work in Italy," published by the Waldensian Church, we read of an interesting work which has sprung up in a small Italian village named Salle. To reach that town, which is stationed in the Abruzzi, one must travel a long way by train, then ride on donkey back three hours over a very rough road. This town of Salle was formerly a centre of great ignorance and superstition; but the Gospel was brought to Salle by immigrants who returned home from North America. Although the first beginnings of the work aroused fierce persecutions, yet now there is a handsome building dedicated which includes a little church, schoolrooms and a small lodging for evangelists. In another town, Ortono, according to this same report, a like work has been commenced also through immigrants returned from the United States.

Personally, I am thoroughly convinced of the value of street preaching, especially to foreigners. There is good deal of prejudice on their par about entering churches; but they wi gather around you on the street an listen with an interest that is fairl pathetic, and one can read in thei faces the unsatisfied longing of th soul. I should like to make an earnes appeal for such systematic preachin of the Gospel on the highways and by ways. It was where Jesus himself di his preaching.

A good deal is said nowadays abou the decadence of the Church. If ther is any truth in the statement, is th reason hard to find? Christ's last com mand to every disciple (and that in cludes you and me) was to make dis ciples of all nations. I do not inte pret this to mean necessarily for us t go as foreign missionaries, but in ou own sphere in life, to be active i bringing others to Christ. May I b permitted to make a personal applica tion of this truth? How many soul have you won to Christ this year Some may answer that this definite re sult is beyond human control. Thi may be true; yet it is also true that i the seed of truth is sown, it is sure t spring up into eternal life under God' blessing. How much effort are yo now making in this direction? Hov many times have you preached th Gospel to others this month? Hav you, a single time? Let us not be con tent unless we are seeking dail through the various churches and mis sions, but especially on the streets an through personal work, as well a through the broader field of thos whose lives touch ours in business an in the community, to bring these soul to Christ. Our opportunities are won derful and we hold in our hands lever of the power of which we have neve dreamed. Let us by faith grasp th opportunity to-day and seek systemat ically to bring others, especially ou immigrant friends, to Christ. God' Word tells us that such bread cas upon the waters will return afte many days.

Astronomical Queries

Answered by Prof. S. P. Leland, Seabreeze, Fla.

V. A. S., Johnstown, O. Was the Star of Bethlehem visible here? The Texas papers were full of it, but no notice was taken in Ohio.

There are certain stars known as variable stars. Some are periodic in appearance and some very irregular. When one of these blossoms out in blazing splendor unscientific men stand in awe, while the superstitious think it portends some great calamity to the people of this little world. The star they call the Star of Bethlehem was probably Mira in the Cetus.

W. H. G., Lockport, N. Y. 1. I noticed at the time of our last eclipse of the sun that the moon set with the sun, that is, nearly northwest, and in July set about southwest. I fail to understand it. 2. I understand the north star is the centre of the universe. Now the big dipper, as it is commonly called, makes its circuit around that star every twenty-four hours. Is the dipper nearer to it than we are?

1. The motion of our moon in space is very complicated and apparently irregular. It is not situated in the plane of the earth's path, but its path is inclined about five degrees to ours, and this inclination varies greatly. It sometimes oscillates fully ten minutes of arc. In winter the full moon is very high, but in summer it is correspondingly low, and what is sometimes called the swinging movement of the earth causes the moon to greatly change the points of its rising and setting, as noted in the question. 2. If, in imagination, we prolong the earth's axis of rotation to the vault of the sky it will reach a point around which the stars seem to revolve in an opposite direction to the revolution of the earth and opposite to the movement of the hands of a clock. The apparent motion of the stars around this point is apparent only, and is caused hy the movement of the earth on its axis, and makes a revolution every 23 hours 56 minutes and 43 seconds. The bright star, Alpha, in the constellation of the Little Bear, is but little more than one degree from the polar point and is known as the north star. This star is gradually approaching the exact pole. This star is by no means the centre of the un verse, for centre there is none. The stars d not revolve around this polar star, but appea to us to do so, caused by the earth's motion. I riding rapidly on a railway car near to woode land the trees seem to us to whirl around. Thi seeming motion is caused by our own movemen The trees do not move, nor do the stars.

W. E. G., Hancock, Vt.; A. P, Russelville, Ky and others. I would like to ask wha is the large, bright star that I see in th early evening in the southwestern skies It is very bright, and you can see it befor it is very dark. It has been there a lon time.

The bright star in the southwestern sky i the evening is the planet Venus. It sets abou one hour after the sun. Several correspondent have asked the same question.

Reader, Oxford, Kan. If we ascended fift miles, would the sky look black, and th stars shine as brightly in the daytime as a night?

Light is a force causing undulations or vibra tions of matter, and wherever matter exist light must be present. All space is, doubtless filled by attenuated or solid matter. Our eye are so constructed, however, that they ca only absorb these vibrations within a narro limit; that is, can take in only a certain num ber of them in a given time. Scientificall speaking, therefore, there is no space withou light, though our eyes may be unable to detec it. Far removed from our revolving eart there would be no day and no night, and th sky would be continually the same.

A. F. H., Peace Valley, Mo. 1. What cause the changes of the moon? 2. What bod is it that eclipses it in the changes?

1. Answered, in substance, for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some time ago. 2. The moon i not eclipsed in its changes. Its position i relation to the earth causes its changes. Whe its entire lighted face is toward us, it is fu moon. When only one-half of its face i visible, it is either the first or last quarte When no part of its lighted face is toward u it is the old of the moon. The moon shine only by the reflected light of the sun.

A Rattlesnake

[The facts on which this story is founded were pplied by H. W. E., a reader of The Christian ERALD.]

EVEN those of us who do not know much about rattlesnakes, and ever saw one, tremble at the name. Ve know a rattlesnake is a terrible reature. We hope we shall never appen to meet one in a lonely place— r, indeed, anywhere else.

In some parts of our country, espeially those that are new and sparsely ettled, these deadly reptiles are very umerous. People there become expert ı ways of dealing with them, and arn the remedies for the poison; but ey know that these remedies do not lways cure.

Twenty years ago in Colorado the verett family found that the farm hich they had taken up was full of attlesnakes. Mr. Everett killed irty-six in one summer. He saw any more, but either they escaped m or else he escaped them.

A rattlesnake can aim more surely at the most skilful sharpshooter, and e poison which it throws is fatal. It ust be sucked from the wound made their bite, or else antidotes must be mediately used. If the poison is left work its way through the system of e victim, he will surely die.

Every year a new rattle grows on e rattlesnake. By the time he is velve years old or more, he can make much noise as a policeman's oldshioned rattle.

It is only due to the rattlesnake to y that he has a certain amount of anners in his dealings with his emy. He does not jump out at him e an Indian from his ambush. Oh, . He gives him a pretty fair warng. When he feels it his duty to bite ybody, he rattles away loudly berehand.

Then he winds himself up into a coil, ves a mighty jump, sinks his fangs to his foe, and with them the poison th which he is always so amply supied.

Mr. Everett had pre-empted a homead section of land and had erected on it a sod house. Not far away as a ravine. This was full of water spring and early summer. But it n dry later in the season.

Mr. Everett had heard of this culiarity of the ravine. He therere made a sort of a well in it while e water was still plentiful. This ll was about four feet deep, and its les were square, measuring about ree feet each. These Mr. Everett ed with strong boards.

In the fall he decided to move to braska, and he foresaw that those ards would be needed.

"Go down to the well," he said to s son Wesley, "and knock off those ards. I will be working close by re and will help you carry the boards to the house."

The boy jumped into the well and gan to pound away at his task, one one lifting the boards out and layig them on the grass beside the well. His father returned before the last e was out. Looking down into the ll, an expression of horror suddenly erspread his face.

"Jump!" he shrieked. "There is a ge rattlesnake right by your leg!"

The boy gave one startled leap into fety. Then, and not until then, the eat reptile sounded its fearful rattle. r. Everett finally succeeded in killig him, but it was only after a hard ttle, for the creature was evidently c and experienced.

For at least five minutes that boy d been standing in the well. The rtlesnake might easily have stabbed n a dozen times over. It seemed thing less than a miracle that he had n spared.

Why had not the creature done its deadly work upon the boy?

Possibly because he was so close beside it, while it usually springs upon its prey from a distance of two or three feet or more. Possibly it was in a deep sleep. Possibly it was dazed by the suddenness with which the boy had plunged down beside it.

Nobody will ever know just how he happened to have been spared from those awful fangs. But when young Everett grew to manhood, he always said, as he finished relating this thrilling story, "I believe it was only the power of God which held that great snake still and saved my life."

Reciprocity

THIS word has been used so much of late years in connection with the tariff, that many people have forgotten that it can and should be applied to daily life also.

In politics, when one nation gives another the privilege of buying certain goods free from the tariff which it imposes on other nations, or with a lower tariff; and the favored nation promises to do the same, reciprocity has been established between them. One has done the other a favor and that other has reciprocated.

We do not often remember that all life is founded on this idea of reciprocity. The man who calmly receives gifts from others and never gives anything back, is a caitiff and a "sponge."

And yet there is something offensive in the idea of measuring accurately our obligations to our friends, and repaying them on a sort of commercial basis, in the same coin. A delicate sense is needed to discriminate in the matter. Be nobly alive to all kindness. Look out that you keep up your end in every friendship. Yet never too accurately weigh such matters or seem to "count the pennies" in reckoning up your friendly obligations.

As for direct money debts to your friends, never incur them unless in an extremity. Nothing cools friendship like borrowing money. By careful financiering, one can usually "make out," if one has a regular income. Twist and turn, go without, sell something, even pawn something, rather than borrow.

Reciprocity is a great thing, and a noble thing; absolutely necessary to a well-ordered life. The rich man who does not practise it is "hated of his neighbor." The poor man who does not, soon becomes known, in the disagreeable slang of the street, as a "dead beat,"—one of the lowest forms of humanity.

Muzzles

OLD ROVER was muzzled. With wide-open eyes
Our Philip surveyed him; then asked in surprise,
"What is that strange thing that the poor doggie's got?
He don't like it, does he? I'm sure I should not."

"A muzzle, to keep him from biting, my dear."
"A muzzle!" said Philip. "That sounds very queer."
But the subject was dropped as the dog fell behind,
Though plainly the muzzle impressed Philip's mind.

A quarrel—and Baby Jack came off ahead
By biting poor Philip's thumb until it bled.
"Oh!" Philip cried, struggling to keep the tears back,
"Won't you please muzzle Jack, mother —please muzzle Jack!"

Aunt Emily's Dessert.

'See this, Aunt Em'ly? Jell-O for you. Made it all by myself. Don't that look good?"

And Aunt Emily, giving Nan a good hug, says:
"You darling girl, how perfectly lovely in you!

JELL-O

is the nicest dessert. I'm partial to it for more than one reason. The five-cent loaf weighs a good deal less than it used to, and the roast that was fifty cents is a dollar now, but the Jell-O dessert has never gone up in price, and is as big and good as ever."

That is all true. However high in price everything else goes, the big Jell-O dessert that serves six persons is all there and costs only a dime, just as it always has.

A Jell-O dessert can be made in a minute. No dessert that requires an hour is any better.

Seven delightful flavors: Strawberry, Raspberry, Lemon, Orange, Cherry, Peach, Chocolate.

Plain Words on the Liquor War

By SILAS C. SWALLOW

THE progress of the incoming tide is to be judged at the end of the hour rather than at the end of a minute. The ebb and flow of the liquor traffic must be measured by decades and not by months.

Official reports from the United States Internal Revenue Department show that while under the operations of local option the number of saloons, and also the number of the kegs of liquor sold, have greatly decreased, yet the aggregate sale of intoxicants, by means of bottles, "freight," "express," "mail advertising," "boot leg," "blind pig," and "blind tiger" methods, is steadily increasing. And this is so because officials are not elected to enforce prohibition where secured by non-partisan methods.

In five years there has been a claimed decrease of approximately 13,000 out of the 250,000 places where liquors were sold, but the 237,000 left have been able to do as much or more business and with more profit, and this would doubtless be true if the decrease was four-fold, for there has been an increase of the sale of spirituous and malt liquors combined of 211,174,073 gallons. The government reports show further that in the seven years ending with 1909 the number of dealers in spirituous liquors has decreased by 4,259, and the number of malt liquor dealers has increased by 7,213, making a net increase of 2,954 dealers. The official figures from the Bureau of Internal Revenue for the past ten years, a period in which local option has claimed great victories, show that the production of spirits has recorded a net growth since 1900 of more than twenty-five per cent., while the tax paid on withdrawals from bonded warehouses shows a net increase of a little over twenty per cent.

During these ten years, if the local option advocates give us the correct figures, they have collected and disbursed mostly for salaries over ten millions of money in a non-partisan effort to overthrow the liquor traffic. In order to accomplish that overthrow they have advised voters to remain in their respective, though not always respectable parties, and vote for the best men. These parties receive much of their monetary and suffrage support from the liquor traffic and could hardly be expected to strike down their chief friends and supporters. Their candidates are not pledged either in platform or campaign to any phase of prohibition. Some of them under pressure from local optionists pledge themselves to favor a law allowing the people to decide in ward, township or county for or against the liquor traffic and then go to the polls and vote and work for license. A candidate cannot be other than his party principles and pledges without becoming a traitor to both, and traitors are not to be trusted. Prohibitionward there can be no "good" or "best men" in liquor subsidized parties. When non-partisan local option prohibition is secured, the liquor party politicians holding executive offices from president of the United States, down through governors, mayors, burgesses, sheriffs, policemen and constables say "Let the people execute the law, they got it by non-partisan vote," and the people say, "Let the officials execute it, for they are paid for so doing." And the liquor sellers sell as much as before.

The government reports show that in 1909 there was an increase of 1,547,266 bushels of grain manufactured into liquor over the number of bushels used in 1908. And an increase of 4,605,321 gallons of molasses for the same period used for the same purpose, and the dealers find a way to dispose of their poison in so-called local optionally "dry" territory, because men have not been elected to execute the non-partisan prohibitory law, a it is helpless to execute itself, and th goes forth the shout "Prohibition do prohibit."

Take a single year, or rather ni months of it, from July 1, 1909, April 1, 1910, and compare it with t same period of the preceding y when it was claimed that 15,254 liq sellers had been put out of business local option methods; but alas! t failed to put the business out, for th was an increase in the consumptio spirits and malts combined in t nine months of 67,297,314 gall against a decrease of 70,689,397 lons during the preceding tw months. The business counting months for each year more than its own. The liquor traffic as slai local option is an exceedingly li corpse.

As evidence that the so-called "g men," or many of them, are in si partnership with the liquor dealers herewith quote the exact languag a State superintendent of local op forces, from a lengthy letter now fore me dated March 18, 1910: "I pose you know that we have from beginning promised all our contr tors that their names should no made known, in order to protect t from the boycotting and persecutin the liquor men."

I answered: "No, I don't know but I do know that just the contra necessary to success in this fight, that every contributor must come from his co-partnership, for reve with the liquor dealers, and fight finish this the greatest battle of ages. I would scorn the liquor dea money coming to God's cause thr a cowardly intermediary business and would say to him as was sai Simon the Sorcerer, "Thy money ish with thee." This battle is not fought on the sly, and the attem so fight it by Christian men, mor tent on getting the dollars of liquor sellers and of their friends, on annually saving a hundred t sand immortals from drunk graves and the drunkards' perditi now and for a half century has the secret of the ability of two dred and fifty thousand liquor de to bluff and defy eighty million freemen claiming to be the brave of the worthy sires who staked a Concord, Lexington and Bunker Jesus said: "He that gathereth with me scattereth abroad." "He is not for me is against me." times are ripe for brave men a front and for cowards nowhere.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Certain Rich Man*

LITTLE by little our writers have been growing up to a knowledge whereby they can interpret to the rest of us the emotions and the general inwardness of the great commercial figures of our time. It has taken a good many years, for the methods of our financiers have gradually become complicated and devious; and while the process has been unfolding a worship of wealth has developed among us all. How should we know that these grand estates and splendid equipages and steam yachts were obtained by bribing legislatures and cheating competitors and crushing the life cruelly out of rivals?

But the light has dawned, and though we know now that some great fortunes have come honestly and inevitably, many more have been amassed in ways such as made John Barclay's eyes hard and brassy, and filled his nights with scorching visions.

In the career of John Barclay, the hero of this remarkable book, we are shown a specimen, down to the smallest detail, of the manner in which a man who ought to be serving a life sentence in jail, can steal and forge and cheat on so large a scale that, instead of falling a victim to the law, he rides over it and lands in millionairedom, amid the plaudits of his fellow-men. It is a study well worth careful reading. Men will not love the rich any the better for it, but they will learn something of self-protection and of the despite of morals which is bred by the mad chase after wealth.

Another valuable contribution which Mr. White's book makes to the stock of general information is his opening account of the early days in Kansas. That State, from the first the refuge of hunted and desperate heretics, many of them wild with the noblest dreams of impracticable reforms, has been a puzzle to philosophers and historians. Much of the mystery is explained in these vivid pages.

"Johnnie," said General Ward, "your grandfather was angry when your father entered the ministry and came out here. He offered to give $50,000 to the Kansas-Nebraska cause instead, but your father said no. He said money wouldn't win this cause. He said personal sacrifice was all that would win it—and the death he died was worth millions to the cause of liberty."

It is a good gospel, and the book is full of it, and of others as important.

The lofty ideals of John Barclay's mother had been lost sight of by her son during his years of reckless money-getting; but as he grew older they began to recur to him. At last his remorse grew so great that he burned up his wealth, having previously arranged his affairs so that no one except himself would lose by his deed.

Whether this was a better course than to distribute it among hospitals and colleges, is a question. Is it better to destroy utterly all ill-gotten wealth, or to take it from Satan and use it to further the cause of the Lord? Good and intelligent people will answer this in different ways. Mr. White evidently thinks the destruction of such money is better than the noblest use.

Without regard to the splendid moral of A Certain Rich Man, and its illuminating revelations of modern financial methods, its value as a picture of Kansas life is very great. Characters and events are sketched too surely to be quite fictitious, and hold the reader's interest firmly. Indeed, one should read the book twice, as Les Miserables and other great novels should be read. One is too apt to skip freely at first, in order to get the story. On the second reading, one is more likely to find the real meat and marrow of it.

A Certain Rich Man.* By William Allen White, author of Stratagems and Spoils, The Court of Bourville, etc. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

"The Calling of Dan Matthews"*

MR. WRIGHT evidently does not mean to make his hero appear contemptible; but it is hard to respect a man who gives up a magnificent work, just because he finds hypocrites and hollowness in the church. Hypocrisy and formality were the bane of the church in Paul's time, and they have been ever since. It would seem that Dan Matthews must have studied his church history to little purpose.

The opinions of the trained nurse, which are so powerful in changing the life-purpose of Dan Matthews, sound silly to the mere reader, who is not subjected to the charm of her personality. She, too, considers the church a sham, a mere husk. She feels that one can do Christ service best by cutting loose from this degenerate institution and as a free lance promoting religion.

To some extent, it is true, the Church may be faulty and inadequate; but it is still honest and noble in its aims. No finer or purer body of men exists than the ordained clergy of our evangelical communions. There are drones occasionally to be found among them, but they are rare.

It would have been much more manly in Dan Matthews to have profited by the lessons which he had learned in Corinth, and to have gone to another parish and bravely persisted in his chosen work. To retire to his farm, perhaps opening there a profitable mine, may have been personally an easier and pleasanter course for him; but a true soldier of the cross would not have given up so easily, much less have deserted the church, without lifting a finger to make it better and cure its sickness.

The book seems calculated to do more harm than good.

A Mind that Found Itself†

THIS book is a document of great interest; all the more so because of its authenticity. For here is a mind that relates in detail its struggle with neurasthenia and its collapse; its experiences in a hospital for the insane; the growth and passing of its hallucinations, and the crude and brutal methods used in our asylums for the purpose of subduing the wills of their unfortunate inmates. Its author, after exposing the barbarities practised in our asylums, makes an earnest plea for the practice of non-restraint in those institutions. In a letter quoted in the introduction, Professor William James, of Harvard University, says: "The book ought to go far toward helping along that terribly needed reform, the amelioration of the lot of the insane of our country."

Two Ways of Bible Reading*

MOST of us can testify that we have never sat down to read the Bible, especially if we have been reading it in course, without finding in it some word or some meaning which was new to us.

The wonder and greatness of the book grow upon us the more we read it.

In the old days, theologians used to study it, largely in order that they might find in it arguments to support special dogmas. In our time, we are learning that its chief value is as a guide to righteous and holy living.

Are you engaged in business? Are you just starting in life in a large city, perhaps far away from home and friends? Are you dreamy and inclined to be impractical in this hard and practical world? Then read the book of Proverbs. It is full of wisdom and of clear warnings.

Are you lonely and unhappy, feeling that the world loves you not? Read the book of Psalms. Are you tempted to feel that God has ceased to make himself felt in the conduct of this world, and that he has given us over to the forces of evil? Read the prayer of Habakkuk and the first chapter of Hebrews.

Are you in the terrible throes that have followed the loss of one near and dear to you? Does the affliction dim in your shaken soul the vision of immortality? Read the fifteenth chapter of I. Corinthians; the twenty-second chapter of Revelation; the second chapter of I. John; and the first chapter of I. Peter.

There is no calamity which can befall us; no dilemma in which we can be placed; no joy which can delight us; for which the Word of God has not some fitting counsel, or some responsive sentiment.

From the Bible the great poets have ever drawn many of their most beautiful lines and figures. Some one has counted the Biblical allusions in Shakespeare, Browning and Tennyson, and they mount up into the hundreds, being especially numerous in the works of the latter.

Most of our own best beloved poets were nourished and inspired by the same great source of light and true feeling. The poet Whittier was especially saturated with its spirit and its language.

For example, take his famous poem upon the imprisonment, trial and release of the Quaker maiden, Cassandra Southwick.

As she lies in her cell, she remembers the fiery furnace in which Daniel was thrown with his three faithful companions; of Paul and Silas "within Philippi's cell"; and of Peter, from whose "sleeping limbs the prison shackles fell."

As she went forth to her trial, "a low, deep voice within her" seemed to be whispering:

Though thy earth be as the iron, and thy heaven a brazen wall,
Trust still His loving kindness, whose power is over all.

The wicked rulers live in a "house of Rimmon." The crowd around, whose sympathies are all with the innocent girl, murmur:

Like the herdsman of Tekoa, in Israel of old,
Shall we see the poor and righteous again for silver sold?

Then she is free, and she rejoices in the strain of Miriam, and compares her emancipation again to that of Peter and of Daniel.

Let us read the Bible, not as theologians nor as controversians, but as a guide to the conduct of life, and as a spring of joy and beauty from which we may ever drink and be filled.

Resist the Devil*

A FAVORITE simile with poets a essayists is a comparison of li to a battle. So common has the figu become that we have almost ceased regard it as a figure at all.

When we speak of the battle of lif we usually regard the battle with s as only a part of the mighty conflic The mere getting of a living involve with the great mass, incessant stru gle. The acquirement of an educatio the obtaining of a foothold in one calling; the management of one's fa ily—each one of these involves the e ertion of all our powers.

The other parts of the great batt may come to an end some time; b never, so long as our feet tread t paths of earth, does the battle with s cease.

In one of our modern stories, full bright and telling truths, one chara ter is made to say, "I used to thi that when one arrived at a certain ag one would be free from temptation but I find that Satan has them for a sizes and ages, like ready-ma clothes."

Never was a fitter statement of o lifelong state of siege. We can nev lay aside the gospel armor, so beau fully described in Ephesians. Buck it on when you rise in the mornin Keep it on until you seek your cou again. And even with that and wi your best efforts, so cunning and sk ful is our enemy that he may overcor us in spite of ourselves.

When a man first begins the ne life, he is young and tender.

"Let him," says Henry Drummon "consider himself as a convalescent f a few weeks, and take care where goes. If you are very careful not catch cold for the first few weeks aft you begin to lead a new life, you w succeed, but you will have to build this new body, cell by cell, just as t old body of temptation was built u If any man knows any other man w is in that convalescent condition, him take care, and neither by jest word or temptation, throw that m back."

Mr. H. B. Wright in his book, T Will of God, gives an interesting e ample of the subtle and bewilderi ways in which temptation comes.

The German law, he says, requir that every foreigner entering a ci must be announced to the city poli by his landlord within six days aft arriving. If the landlord fails to this, he is heavily fined. Suppose t foreigner comes, stays four week then prepares to go, and the landlo says to him, "When you go away, don say you have spent a month with m Just say you have been traveling. neglected to announce you. I save fifty cents by this, but if you let it known, I must pay a big fine."

Reason says, "Go ahead and deceiv It is a little matter at most."

Experience says, "Better not g mixed up with a foreign police case

Circumstance says, "You might well make up your mind to lie."

You ask advice and are very like told, "We all do that sort of thing. isn't anything."

Consideration for others say "Don't get this kind and pleasant m into trouble."

Example to others says: "Don't g a reputation for stickling abo trifles."

Conscience says: "Tell the truth. that is the means of getting yo friend into trouble, pay his fine f him. Thus you may prove at the sam time your truthfulness and your u selfishness."

You never know what shape t Tempter will take—but be sure he w attack you in some form.

Farming in Alaska

MANY people seem to have mistaken ideas about Alaska, and think of it as a bleak, barren waste, covered with great ice floes and glaciers and fit only for Eskimos and seals. Such is not the case, however, for a very large part of Alaska has a most delightful climate. In the city of Juneau, says a writer in Colliers' Weekly, the winters are about the same as in the city of Washington, and the summers are not so warm. From Circle, which is situated about the centre of Alaska, clear down to the coast, farming is excellent, and indeed the government stations declare that lettuce, radishes and other farm products are larger, more luscious and better than can be raised in the United States.

The following report from a farmer at Fairbanks, a little more than one hundred miles from the Arctic Circle, will give some idea of what can be done in that section:

"Three acres of potatoes yielded 18 tons, which sold at $120 per ton; two acres of carrots yielded seven and one-half tons, which sold for $140 per ton; fifteen acres of barley brought $75 per ton for the hay. At the end of his report, the farmer says: "There are five million acres of land in the vicinity of Fairbanks, as suitable for agriculture as that I have cultivated." The summer season is shorter than in the States, but there are about eighteen hours of sunshine each day, which make it a veritable forcing-house for plants. The gardens of middle and southern Alaska will grow everything that can be grown in the gardens of Massachusetts or Michigan. Wild flowers, blackberries, strawberries, raspberries, cranberries, blueberries, etc., abound in the valleys of the Yukon and other rivers. When the United States bought Alaska from Russia for $7,200,000 (less than two cents an acre) many of our legislators denounced it as an extravagant waste of money and declared the ground useless. Since that time, Alaska has paid for itself twenty times over in fish alone, and has paid for itself twenty-five times over in gold and silver. Besides these, there are vast deposits of coal, copper and tin still to be worked. The territory purchased is more than twice the size of the German Empire. It lies in the same latitude as Norway, Sweden and Finland; it is larger than all three of these countries combined and has a much better climate, and its ground is better adapted to cultivation. There are 4,750 miles of coast-line, and the whole United States has only 3,705 miles. Nowhere in this country are there such great cattle and sheep ranges as are to be found in Alaska.

The Migration of the Quail

DR. H. C. MORRISON, the well-known evangelist, recently related the following incident at a great camp-meeting at Des Plaines, near Chicago, where he was one of the principal speakers: "In our recent evangelistic tour around the world we arrived at Port Said, Egypt, on the Sabbath day. Dowling has said that Port Said is the nearest to hell of any place he was ever in. The ungodliness there is fearful. The one thing that struck me as peculiar was that we saw live quails everywhere. Boys were carrying them about the streets. They were sold everywhere in the markets. I saw a woman carrying a basket of quails on her head, and she was plucking the feathers off one as she walked along the streets. At the hotel where we dined, we were served with quail on toast. I asked where so many quail came from. They told me that from the immemorial quail had flown from Europe to Egypt in myriads every September. They fly south to escape the cold weather, and they fly by hundreds of thousands and millions just as the pigeons did in Ohio and Virginia in an early day. The Egyptians erect poles like telegraph poles and stretch nets on them to entangle the quail when they fly against them, and then the people get them. This reminded me of how God sent the quail to feed the children of Israel not far from Port Said."

In Dreamland

OUR baby's asleep, we've put her in bed;
We've covered her up, except arms and her head.
Her arms are extended, with limp little hands,
Enjoying the breezes of fairy Dreamland!
She'll surely be happy when waking from sleep;
Her face looks so pleasant she's sure not to weep.
It makes us feel happy while by her we stand,
Of what is she thinking in fairy Dreamland?

Crooked Spines Made Straight

If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble you can be relieved in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man who relieved himself of Spinal Curvature. Its results are marvelous. It is nature's own method. Eminent physicians are endorsing it. The Sheldon Method relieves the pressure of the affected parts of the spine, the whole spine is invigorated and strengthened, all soreness is taken out of the back, the cartilage between the vertebrae is made to expand, the contracted muscles are relaxed and the spine is straightened. There is bright hope for you, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every State in the Union. Each appliance is made to order from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing. We guarantee satisfaction and let you use it 30 days. Write for our new book, giving full information and references.

MAKING FRIENDS AT CHEYENNE

AN ELEGANT REPRODUCTION OF A BEAUTIFUL

$250,000 PAINTING

TO BE GIVEN AWAY FOR A FAVOR

REQUIRED FIVE YEARS TO PAINT IT---A GREAT OFFER TO REGULAR SUBSCRIBERS AND THEIR FRIENDS

A Copy of "Mona Liza" Should Be in Every Home

PROBABLY no painting has created more wide-spread interest than the "Mona Liza" of Leonardo da Vinci. It has been said, though not authoritatively, that the British Government once offered one million pounds for its possession.

The subject, "Mona Liza," or "La Gioconda," as she is sometimes called, was the wife of Gioconda, a Florentine citizen. It was between 1500 and 1506 that she posed for Da Vinci. The execution of this painting took five years, as it was only while seated in a certain posture, and listening to a certain strain of music, that her face took on that peculiarly elusive expression so wonderfully portrayed on the canvas. Da Vinci dared not have her sit for him very often, for he feared that too frequent repetition might lessen the strange effect of her surroundings. Some one has said that this picture is divine work rather than the work of man. And it is true that in facial expression and in the delicacy of skin texture Da Vinci has here wrought to a degree almost perfect.

It is estimated that the original "Mona Liza" could be sold to-day for anywhere from $250,000 to $500,000. It is beyond doubt one of the masterpieces of art, and we know of no subject more deserving of a place in the home than the beautiful and sublime "Mona Liza." It is impossible to think of owning the original "Mona Liza," but The Christian Herald's reproduction from the original painting is absolutely flawless in every detail. Copies of reproductions, far below The Christian Herald's picture, command from $3.00 to $10.00 a copy. We offer you "Mona Liza" in return for a favor. Read our offer below.

"MONA LIZA"

Painted by Leonardo Da Vinci.
Actual Size, 11½ x 17¼ Inches.

NOTE—This reproduction is only a half-tone, which by no means conveys the full measure of beauty of the double-tone photogravure.

How to Get the Picture Almost FREE

FOR several years it has been customary for the readers of The Christian Herald, and the publishers, to enter into a co-operative plan, having for its object the introduction of the magazine into homes where its influence would be felt in a manifestly effective manner. This plan has always been productive of fine results to the readers, by giving them a substantial reward; to the new readers thus introduced, by providing them with the helpful comradeship of The Christian Herald, and to the publishers, by enabling them to send you each week a better and a more entertaining magazine.

Believing that you have the same deep and sincere interest in The Christian Herald that you have shown in the past, we ask for your co-operation in our endeavor to widen the constantly increasing circulation of The Christian Herald. Your task will be an easy and pleasant one, requiring no work to speak of, and at the same time offering an opportunity to secure a copy of an excellent reproduction of one of the world's greatest paintings. Your only expense will be 10 cents, the cost of mailing, etc.

The Christian Herald has, for years, achieved a glorious success in carrying forward religious and philanthropic causes. Much of its splendid record belongs to its readers—to you who have always been loyal and responsive. But the opportunity for still greater work is so big that we are anxious to go forward at an even faster pace than ever. Won't you therefore work with us, hand in hand, for a gradual but sure growth in the Christian Herald Family?

WHY AND HOW WE CAN MAKE YOU THIS EXTRAORDINARY OFFER

Can't you call to mind the names of many people who would enjoy, and possibly be benefited by, The Christian Herald? There are thousands of persons scattered far and wide who would appreciate the Herald, and they would gladly subscribe if they knew of the value and helpfulness of The Christian Herald. It would take years and years for us to reach even a tithe of these people, but you can aid us very materially.

We therefore ask you to send us the names of twenty-five people, consisting of heads of families and young men and women you think desirable. Only one name is required from a family. To these names we will send sample copies of The Christian Herald and of our Special Holiday Offers.

To reward you for your courtesy in assisting THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to increase its Family of loyal and enthusiastic readers, we will send you a copy of the famous "Mona Liza," asking you to pay the cost of packing, mailing, etc., which in every case will be but 10 cents. There is no further expense attached to this offer, and we guarantee to deliver the picture securely packed, uncreased and in perfect condition. Won't you give us the stimulating influence of your support in our effort to send The Christian Herald, with its message of love and cheer, into more homes throughout the land? You can easily supply the names; you will do it, and we are going to depend upon you.

PLEASE OBSERVE THESE CONDITIONS — THE DEMAND WILL BE HEAVY — ACT QUICKLY

We ask you to kindly send us the names of twenty-five people, who in your estimation would enjoy The Christian Herald. These people should be carefully selected. The names of Sunday School Superintendents, Teachers, Sunday School attendants and ardent church workers are the very best kind of people you can get. All good, thrifty people, people of an optimistic frame of mind, would be sure to be interested in The Christian Herald.

Send only one name from each family. Write plainly. Be sure to spell the names correctly, and if you have any doubt about the spelling of any name verify it by inquiring of your postmaster or by reference to a directory or telephone book. Write on one side of the paper only.

Every name must have a Prefix (such as Mr., Mrs., Miss, Dr., Prof., Rev.), Christian name (as Mary, John, etc.), Post-Office Address, County and State. In case of Free Delivery Office in city or country, either the Street Address or the number of the Rural Free Delivery route should be supplied. Thus an address correctly supplied would read something like this:

Dr. James Potter, Chicago, Cook Co., Ill., 572 Adams Street.
OR:—
Miss Ruth Jackson, Westminster, Worcester Co., Mass., R.F.D. No. 6.

Address your letter to "List Department," Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City. Enclose ten cents in stamps or silver to pay packing and mailing expenses of the beautiful "Mona Liza," which will be sent you at once.

As the offer is confined to the members of The Christian Herald Family and their immediate friends, it is essential for you to sign your letter as follows:

"I am a Christian Herald reader."
OR:—
"I am a friend of a Christian Herald reader."

As we have heretofore observed, it is our intention to send copies of our Holiday Offers to these names. Therefore it is highly important to select them carefully, and to be absolutely sure that they are written plainly enough to be transmitted correctly. A little care here will save you disappointment.

CELEBRATING MEXICO'S CENTENNIAL

FROM the smallest mountain hamlet of Sonora in the north, to the southernmost town in the State of Chiapas in the south, all Mexico is gay with flags and decorations, ready to celebrate the centennial of the country's independence. The spirit of the occasion has pervaded every class of society. Every Mexican, from President Diaz in the National Palace down to the poorest peon, whose worldly wealth is a sombrero, a shirt, and a blanket when he can get one, is keenly alive to the importance of the celebration, and is leaving nothing undone to make it a success, and to increase the importance of Mexico in the eyes of the special delegations and the incoming flood of tourists from foreign lands.

It was just one hundred years ago the fifteenth of this September, that the curate Miguel Hidalgo, in the little adobe village of Dolores, entered his little chapel, lighted only by a flickering taper, and grasping the bell rope, rang out a warlike peal, which brought every man of his flock hurrying to the little plaza before the church, eager to know the cause of the unusual clangor. Many of them knew, and they came to the chapel as a rendezvous, armed to the teeth. It was the signal for revolt against the authority of Spain, whose red and yellow banner until that moment had flown unchallenged since the early days of the sixteenth century. The war of independence was brought to a successful conclusion by the patriotic party, but Hidalgo lost his life in the conflict. He won, however, the lasting gratitude of his half-Spanish, half-Aztec countrymen, and his name is revered as the martyr of independence. His figure will be seen in the historical floats in the parades in Mexico City and in the other large towns of the Mexican States. At twenty minutes past seven on the fifteenth, President Diaz will ring the old Independence Bell of Dolores, which has been brought as a sacred relic to the capital, and the Mexicans in street and square below will cheer and then raise their voices in the stirring verses of the centennial hymn. In every other Mexican town the crowds will be waiting the signal to cheer and sing the hymn.

Naturally the most important events of the Centennial will take place in the capital. The preparations are on a scale equaling if not surpassing those made for our recent Hudson-Fulton celebration. The fact that two hundred thousand dollars will be spent on the State banquet alone gives an idea of the magnificent scale on which the government will dispense its hospitality. Visitors have been pouring in from all South and Central America, from Europe, especially Spain and those countries which have had strong historical or commercial connections with Mexico, and from the United States. The American colony is usually a large one and this is being daily increased by a throng of tourists, who have just found out what our historian Prescott discovered years ago when he wrote: "Of all that extensive empire which once acknowledged the authority of Spain in the New World, no portion for interest and importance can be compared with Mexico; and this equally whether we consider the variety of its soil and climate; the inexhaustible stores of its mineral wealth; its scenery, grand and picturesque beyond example; the character of its inhabitants, not only far surpassing in intelligence that of the other North American races, but reminding us, by their monuments, of the primitive civilizations of Egypt and Hindostan; or lastly, the peculiar circumstances of its conquest, adventurous and romantic as any legend devised by Norman or Italian bard of chivalry."

One of the Beautiful Parks in Mexico City

Those who have not been in Mexico are inclined to believe that Prescott was too much impressed by his subject; those who have really been there are impressed with the fact that he knew the country well and epitomized its attractions in those few lines.

The United States sends a former governor of Massachusetts as a special ambassador to carry the felicitations of the country. Germany sends, with its embassy, a statue of Von Humboldt, to be unveiled in one of the public squares. China sends a memorial and the Sultan of distant Turkey will show his friendly feeling toward Mexico by erecting a clock tower in the capital.

Spain pays a most graceful tribute to her lost daughter. She returns the faded uniform of the Revolutionary general and hero, José Maria Morelos. Generals carrying banners captured in battle will surround the ambassador as a guard of honor, and as the uniform is presented to Diaz, cannon will be fired and massed bands will play the national air.

France, not to be outdone in courtesy by Spain, will give back the silver keys presented to General Forey in 1863 when he captured Puebla.

The capital has been housecleaning for months—painting and repairing. The government is determined that the people shall present a good appearance and has provided free baths,

A SERMON BY

Bishop H. W. Warren*

The World's Greatest Asset

TEXT—Ps. 8:5 (R. V.)

ANTICIPATING our arrival in this world, prevenient love sought the finest fabrics of earth's choicest looms, and dainty fingers set the finest stitches, and loving hearts filled all the future with the embroidery of rainbow colors. These prevenient preparations testified to the love of the expectant parents, but especially testified to the estimation in which they held these coming angels of God, these cherubs who had lost their way and come to earth.

So the value of man is seen in the preparation made for his coming.

This majestical world, the cradle in which God meant to rock and swing his man child, was not made in a week, even by infinite wisdom and power. But through ages measureless to man, infinite painstaking and care were bestowed upon its development. It was stored with infinite energy, beautified with infinite delicacy, packed with thought, and provided with everything necessary for the life, comfort and development of its coming king. The cradle of the race was made so rich that after thousands of years man is only just beginning to spell out the single syllables of its wisdom and power. All this was made for man. We rightly sing:

> We for whose sake all nature stands
> And stars their courses move.

It is impossible to enumerate all these realms of wealth, of beauty and power, because we have not yet discovered them all, and have not yet grown into perception and appreciation of them all. It is but a few days since we discovered the possibility of wireless telegraphy. On the wide ocean I was anxious to learn the fate of my friends on the sinking steamship Republic. We listened in the silent spaces of the infinite sky, and heard the joyful tidings that they all were safe. The little ear by which we heard the news was but a hand's breadth. But all the wide world's air was full of it for all earth's countless millions to hear. But how few had ears to hear! So all space is teeming full of countless thousands of messages that none of us are yet able to hear. Earth and all its powers came out of infinite wisdom, power and love, and we are finite yet.

Our Wonderful Frame

The savage delights only in clanging cymbals for instrumental, and in the warwhoop for vocal music. But the finer ear gets rapture from the soft cadences of the evening breeze breathing over Aeolian harpstrings, and in those gentle voices of angels bending near to touch their harps of gold when the Prince of Peace was born. The more refined we become the more we find. The newly discovered qualities and potencies of radium are an amazement, but earth has still a thousand more amazements to follow. And all this unthinkable equipment indieates the estimate of the infinite Father for his child. The grandeur of the kingdom indicates the greatness of the king—indicates, but oh how feebly! The figure eight laid horizontally is the algebraic sign for infinity, but how insignificant the symbol compared to what it suggests! So of the world and man. Man is measureless and priceless. There is no legal tender to represent his value. A little vault of gold, or even a piece of paper based thereon, is legal tender for a palace and a vast estate, but a whole world gained as the price of one soul lost is profitless, leaves it a pauper forever.

Take a single illustration of the capabilities of man's body. Go out on the top of the round world and be domed over by the infinite sky. There are millions of blazing suns sending their rays of light at a speed of 186,000 miles a second, all freighted with intelligence of the substance and history of each varying world, and they pour these rays untangled through an aperture like a pin prick, and crossing each other spread all this intelligence on the retina of the eye, only about an eighth of an inch in diameter, and all this varied intelligence is carried on a filmy thread back to the countless chambers of the brain, to be read, treasured and imparted to others. This filmy thread and pulpy retina can discern the different number of vibrations of every different color—red having four hundred and fifty millions of millions per second and every other color having a different number. Surely we are fearfully as well as wonderfully made. Capacity for chords and harmonies means also capacity for discords and janglings out of tune. And ecstasies of pleasure must involve ecstasies of pain as well. The worth of human bodies is seen in the fact that the Son of God tabernacled in just such flesh as ours, and he declares that the bodies of all of us here present to-day may be temples fit for the indwelling of the Holy Ghost. Not only was man made in the likeness of God, but Paul says that the Son of God was made in the likeness of men.

Man's Mind a Marvel

But the wonders of man's body are infinitely surpassed by the wonders of his mind. He can see the glory of the rainbow on the back of the retreating thunderous cloud. Gorgeous and glorious it is, but far more glorious it is that he can see the cause of it. He can see that a rain drop in falling shatters the speeding light and spills its glory over the sky. He can see the vast spectroscopic wealth of ideas, see the varying substance of the stars, their approach or retrocession. Nay, more, he can see that its quiet and exquisite loveliness, after forked lightning and seeming elemental wreck of thunder, make it a fit emblem of perfect peace. Nay more, reason asserts that there must be cause for these effects. And while man in his search discovers that he cannot by intellectual searching find out God, he finds that he has faculties finer than reason, as reason is finer than fingers; and by these faculties he comes to know God. These faculties are so near akin to God that like kindred drops they mingle into one. And this knowing God makes eternal life necessary. He discovers that faculties are so like the eternal God that eternity is a necessity. Senses for things of sense. Reason for things of thought and mind, but faith for things of God. Faith sees the invisible, touches the intangible, hears the inaudible. The unseen is as real as the seen; the inaudible as the audible; the intangible as the things we handle. Nay, far more so. All the seen comes out of the unseen and returns thither. Into this realm comes faith and is at home. It knows God. It endures hardship, torture, martyrdom, since it sees him who is invisible. Faith is earlier and more universal than either sense or reason, and hence is the only possible foundation for the universal religion of Jesus Christ. All great powers, as gravitation, steam, electricity and wind, are invisible. And he that sees the invisible sees the real things of the universe, and is made great thereby. The great masters of all the ages have been this kind of men. This is true in the realm of thought: who rules the ages like Paul? true in painting: instance Rubens, Murillo, Raphael; true in music: Beethoven, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn and Mozart; true in architecture: all the builders of cathedrals. Here man reaches the climax of his being. He sees the infinite and eternal God face to face and is not consumed; nay, he glows with holy joy and rapture in every highest attribute of his being. We can find out some things without feeling fingers: some by the infinities of power in the eye, some by the farther flights of reason; but faith and heart alone know God. And herein lies man's greatest glory and this world's greatest asset.

The Price Paid for Our Redemption

But while man's value has no legal tender of worlds, as we have said, his value is indicated by the price that was paid for his redemption. He was too good to be lost, and when sin had palsied the arm meant for sceptre-swaying, dimmed the vision meant for seeing God in his works and turned to stoniness the heart that was meant to throb with love for the infinite Lover, we could not be redeemed with corruptible things, with silver or gold, but only with the precious blood of Christ. Worlds of gold had no value then, but God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believed on him should not perish but have everlasting life. So he that was rich in hierarchies, thrones, dominions, orders of angelic beings, for our sakes became poor that we through his poverty might be made rich. And poverty, deprivation, was the least of the price. He took a world's burdens and carried its sorrows, hushed its wails on his loving bosom, till the weight of sorrows and sins broke h heart on Calvary and carried infinite life into t dark realms of death. We cannot estimate the pr paid, but we feel that the thing bought justified t price, because he shall see the travail of his s and be satisfied. This joy set before him enab him to endure the cross and despise the shame.

The worth of man is clearly seen in the kind work to which he is invited. It would have b much if he had been left to dominion over the f of the air, cattle of the field, fish of the sea, a besides fish, whatever passes through the paths the sea, gravitation, magnetism, etc. But he is vited to a far higher kind of work. And in t work he is to have the personal companionship a co-operation of God. Locomotives, steamshi lighthouses, wireless stations, astronomical obser tions are not symbols of man's greatest work, a more than swung worlds and gulf-streams of st are symbols of God's greatest works. These easy to him. He speaks and it is done, commar and it stands fast. But works of redemption, s vation and glorification require the going forth all the power of the mind and the heart of G They require not merely the exercise of the att butes of God, as omnipotence, omniscience, etc., l the outgoing of his very essence, and that is love

> 'Twas great to speak a world from naught,
> 'Twas greater to redeem.

And into this work man is invited and utiliz Under the laws of the material world it were e for soil to burgeon into flowers, or grow into stat sequoias. It were easy for winds to blow and riv to flow. But there are greater works than the There are woes of a world to be lightened, sighs be turned into laughter, chains of habit to be brok degradations of soul to be stopped and devel ments to be begun, all downward tendencies to turned into upward flights, and a complete and ev lasting salvation to be secured for every will soul. Into this amazing work men are called b partnership divine. It is honor, it is glory; and t man has capabilities for this work is the high conceivable declaration of the supreme worth man. The interests of a thousand millions for t and eternity wait on man's activity. All the sources of the ever blessed God are ready to poured out in co-operation, till the wails of eart weary ones shall be changed to songs of salvat forever and ever. The highest commission e given to man was given on Olivet: "Go ye into the world and preach the Gospel to every creatu and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end the world." Responsibility, capability and co-ope tion combine to testify that man is the greatest as of this world.

A Little Lower than the Angels

But man's value is seen not merely from his o estimate of himself, but in the just and final e mate of God. Man was made in the image and li ness of God, and as the psalmist says, "a little lo than God" [R. V.], and set over the works of hands. But the glorious plan God had for men at creation was marred by disobedience. But God not despair of success. God is yet "mindful of hi "visits him," "sets his heart upon him," "is ashamed to call them brethren." Efforts far bey those of creation were put forth for redempti These efforts so succeeded that there is no poss figure of worth that is not lavished freely to exp God's sense of the value of his people. "I will o the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessi there shall not be room enough to receive it." "T shall be mine in that day when I shall make up jewels." Every tender and precious relation human life is burdened with expression of G value of man. Father, mother, bridegroom, br child, in all they mean in human tenderness and l are used to shadow forth God's appreciation of redeemed ones. And as earth was prepared endowed for the training school of man in the fl so a heaven incomparably more glorious is prepa for developed souls. No wonder Paul sees the r of the eyes of our understanding being enlighte that we may know the excellency of the glory God's inheritance in the saints.

LITTLE MOMENTS AND MARGINS

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

A BOY, James A. Garfield, enjoyed hiding himself for a little moment. These little moments he called margins. What are margins? They are little odds and ends—something that many boys and girls waste. A moment is the margin of a minute and a minute is the margin of an hour. Garfield used the little moments, the margins of time, and in them earned and learned his way from a canal boat to the White House. He walked on the tow-path and drove the mule that pulled the boat. Whenever he found a margin of time he would read something that was worth thinking about while at his walk and work. A short article from Success will give you the secret of moments and margins.

If I Only Had the Time

SOME boys will pick up a good education in the odds and ends of time which others carelessly throw away. What young man is too busy to get an hour a day for self-improvement?

Drive the minutes or they will drive you. Success in life is what Garfield called a question of "margins." Tell me how a Junior uses the little ragged edges of time while waiting for meals or for tardy appointments, or how he spends the evenings, and I will tell you what that Junior's success will be. One can usually tell by his manner, the direction of the wrinkles in his forehead or the expression of his eyes, whether he has been in the habit of using his time to good advantage or not. The same signs are on the face of a girl.

THE Junior who loses no time doubles his life. Wasting time is wasting life. Some squander time, some invest it, some kill it. Four things come not back: the spoken word, the sped arrow, the past life, and the neglected opportunity.

By hiding himself in every little moment he could find, Garfield learned enough to become a teacher. On a pathway paved with moments he found his way from a canal boat to a schoolhouse. While teaching school he improved his spare moments and was soon able to pass his "exams" and enter college. From the schoolhouse to the college he walked along a beautiful path paved with moments and margins. In a few years he was able to pass from the college, where he graduated with honors in 1856, and where for a time he was the president, to the court house. From the court house he went, a moment at a time, to the State senate house. He did not have the time and money to go to West Point, but little moments prepared him to command an army and he become a major-general. At President Lincoln's request he was sent to Congress. Here he never lost a moment until he paved his way to the White House. While serving as the twentieth President of the United States he was in one little evil moment shot by Guiteau, Saturday, July 2, 1881.

ON September 19, just about twenty-nine years ago, he died at Elberon, N. J. On this anniversary of Garfield's death is a good time to look back and see the value of moment margins. Moments made him a great man, and one little evil moment, in which an insane man hid a pistol, our country was robbed of a great President. Death was one little trembling moment on which Garfield stepped from time to eternity. Try to think of how many things, good and bad, can be done in a moment.

Is this all of the story of Garfield's life? No, for one secret of his success is not known to many people. His useful life was Garfield, plus moments, plus something else. A story tells about the other plus.

A SCHOLARLY, fatherly, contented-looking old gentleman was Thomas Garfield, of Hudsonville, Mich. He was the only brother of President James A. Garfield. At the age of eighty-seven he was well and happy. He resided on the same farm near Hudsonville for over forty years and did not leave home over a dozen times after moving to Hudsonville. He was unknown outside his immediate neighborhood, did not seek publicity and liked to be called a plain farmer. He never went to Washington, although he was invited by his brother to make his home at the capital city. He never had the advantage of an education. But James A. Garfield became President by the wise use of spare moments plus this brother. Thomas carried his brother James to school, when the snow was too deep for the future President to walk, and worked from daylight till dark in order to help him to success. He took care of James till he got through high school, and then got his life insured, which carried him through college. "My duty was to stay at home and run the farm," declared Mr. Garfield, "and I did it. James was a politician from the time he was a little fellow. He was a natural orator and had the best memory of any man I ever knew. He could listen to a discourse and repeat it, and once we heard him working out a sum in algebra in his sleep. When he got up in the morning he wrote it out." We would be ashamed of James A. Garfield if he had not loved and honored his brother Thomas.

NOW, Juniors, please hide yourselves in "a little moment" and think. Just think of the fact that every boy and girl, every man and woman who makes a success in life ought to thank and love an elder brother. There is one who sticketh closer than a brother, who never sought any honors in this world, refused to be a King, and spent all his life in order that you might be successful and happy. Hide father for "a little moment" from his Sunday paper and ask him for the story of this "Elder Brother."

Ministers' Salaries

IN a bulletin just issued by the government there are given to the public many interesting facts relative to the number and salaries of ministers in our leading cities, and as to church finances generally. The figures show that there were, in 1906, 164,830 Christian ministers in the United States, besides 1,084 Jewish rabbis, and they increase at the rate of nearly 4,000 a year. Their average salary is $663, and there was paid to them in 1906 a total of $69,667,587. Baptists and Methodists have more than half the whole number of ministers in the country. There are in Manhattan and Brooklyn scores of ministers whose salaries exceed $5,000 a year. The highest salary ever offered a minister in New York was $18,000 a year and a house, offered last year by the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, and declined. Several ministers receive $15,000 a year, and there are a dozen or more who get $12,000. These salaries are the highest in the world.

The average salaries of ministers in cities having 300,000 population and over, for the principal religious bodies, are: Baptist, $1,793; Congregational, $1,938; Methodist, $1,842; Presbyterian, $2,450; Protestant Episcopal, $1,873; Reformed, $1,938; Catholic, $684, and Jewish rabbis, $1,491. Methodist ministers get most of all, the salaries amounting annually to $16,150,000. Baptists receive the next largest, $10,323,000; Presbyterians, $7,610,000; Roman Catholics, $6,779,000; Episcopalians, $4,887,000; Congregationalists, $4,154,000; Reformed, $1,682,000, and Jews, $801,000.

This year the sum of $100,000,000 will be paid to ministers of the whole country in salaries, and congregational expenses, missions and extensions will cost $20,000,000 more.

In New York Episcopal places of worship are worth $25,830,000; Presbyterian, $16,400,000; Methodist, $10,500,000; Baptist, $9,400,000; Reformed, $7,900,000; Lutheran, $6,300,000, and Congregational, $4,260,000. The value of church property in New York is $153,953,740, exclusive of parsonages, hospitals and asylums. The debts in New York are $19,062,419, or about 12.3 per cent. Boston has invested in churches $27,000,000, with debts of 7 per cent. of their value. Chicago has the same sum invested, with 15½ per cent. debts; Baltimore, $14,000,000, with debts of 10⅛ per cent.; Philadelphia, $45,000,000, with 9 per cent. debts, and Washington, $10,000,000, with 10½ per cent. debts.

Glad He Got His Bible

Editor The Christian Herald: I thank you very much for God's blessed Word, which was received yesterday by express, and wife and self will take many hours of comfort and pleasure in reading it together. I felt sure my request would be granted, but did not expect we would receive such a valuable book. It is a precious gift and words fail in our expression of thanks. Again thanking the givers for the Bible and also for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we are, etc.

ROOSEVELT AMONG THE COWBOYS

EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has kept his promise of making a whirlwind tour of the West after his return from Europe. He has made many speeches from train platforms, improvised open-air stands and in public halls, but nowhere has he found audiences so much to his liking, and such keen and hearty appreciation as among the cowboys of Wyoming.

It was a great day for Cheyenne when, on August 27, he struck that city. Soon after arriving he took a thirty-mile ride with his party across the plains on cow ponies. He received the true Wild West welcome and, according to his own declaration, had the "time of his life." To get back once more among the men of the saddle in their own territory, and to comrade with them, as he did many years ago, was to him better than the plaudits of the East or the platitudes of formal reception committees.

Mr. Roosevelt visited the 30,000-acre sheep ranch of Senator Warren, sixteen miles from Cheyenne, and spent several hours amid familiar surroundings, meeting many old cowboy acquaintances. He talked freely with the cow-punchers, and some of the ranchmen rode with him part of the way. But it was in Cheyenne itself that the typical Western welcome was given. There was a tremendous crowd of cowboys and cowgirls in brilliant costumes. A parade took place in which three regiments of troops from a nearby post participated, many of the troopers being members of the Ninth Cavalry which served at San Juan with Roosevelt. To make the day a full one, there was also an automobile ride, a military review, and a visit to the fair grounds at Frontier Park, where Colonel Roosevelt made a speech on conservation. There were games and spectacular sports which included horseback and steer riding and a "champion bucking contest," the whole closing with an Indian war-dance and a wild horse race, with all their thrilling accompaniments. Mr. Roosevelt's party was amazed and delighted with the picturesqueness of the whole affair. They marveled at the brilliant costumes, the silken shirts, the white sombreros and the leather boots of many of the riders. There was no limit to the display of daring horsemanship. A hundred Indians in full war paint and an equal number of squaws gave a touch of Western frontier realism which the six hundred cowboys and cowgirls could not alone have contributed.

Roosevelt Making an Address from His Car on His Western Tour

One feature in the parade was the presence of some sixty Japanese. When the whole was in life, motion and activity, and the bands playing lively marching music, the Colonel's face wore its most beaming smile and to everybody he expressed himself as "simply delighted!"

Some of the sayings of Mr. Roosevelt during his speech at Frontier Park called forth loud applause. He was addressing an audience that was ready to cheer his every utterance. "I don't care," he said, "how patriotic a man is if he runs away in the time of danger." His references to the punishment that should be given wrongdoers in public and private life was greeted with cheers. "If the rules of the game are wrong we should change the rules rather than blame the men who follow them," he said, amid frantic cheering by the cowboys and cowgirls.

When he visited Denver, another ovation awaited him. He spoke in the Auditorium to an audience of twelve thousand, which included the members of the Colorado Livestock Association. He discussed conservation, especially with reference to irrigation and State control of water power sites, and he touched on political topics, but did not indulge in controversy. He also visited the capitol and addressed the legislature in the House chamber, the tenor of his speech being that State and nation should each exercise its legitimate powers to the fullest degree in all matters. He criticised the Supreme Court for its decisions in the Sugar Trust case, touched on trusts, labor, public hygiene, and conservation, and roundly condemned inefficiency and dishonesty in the public service and sensationalism in the press. When the band played "A hot time in the old town," Mr. Roosevelt beat time, his face wreathed in smiles of evident enjoyment.

Leaving Denver, Mr. Roosevelt went through the heart of Colorado and over into western Kansas. He left the train at Pueblo for a little while to lay the cornerstone of the new Y. M. C. A. building and then resumed his trip. He cheered with the boys and hurrahed for the girls at a dozen places along the route, and wherever he stopped, he talked of honesty and good citizenship. Several times he told his audiences how glad he was to be back from Europe, among his own people whom he knew and could understand.

The Flag Delights Him

I AM the happy recipient of your magnificent premium of the beautiful flag and the picture of our national Presidents. The marvel about it is how you can afford to give such valuable premiums. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is worth much more than it costs. It is more eagerly looked for than any other magazine or religious newspaper that comes to our house. It is entertaining, educative and inspiring. Here's God-speed to its weekly mission, as it goes into thousands of homes. I have done something to help its circulation, and shall always be glad to do what I can in that direction.

THE QUAINT PAGEANT OF PETERBORO

A house of dreams untold,
That looks out over the whispering treetops,
And faces the setting sun.

IN these lines from the bronze tablet on the great boulder that marks the grave of the musical composer, Edward MacDowell, at Peterboro, N. H., one finds the title of the pageant given at Peterboro on the 16th, 18th and 20th of August. The pageant was unique in that it was the first musical pageant ever attempted in America, and it was given at the summer home of one who was thought by many to be the greatest musical composer America has ever produced.

The pageant was intended as a memorial to Mr. MacDowell, and was planned to portray the history of Peterboro from the time of its founding in the early part of the eighteenth century down to the present time. Eighteen or twenty carefully arranged scenes, most of them with musical accompaniments, made up a very interesting and beautiful pageant under the direction of Professor George Baker of Harvard University, assisted by Mrs. MacDowell, Chalmers Clinton and Mr. Hermann Hagedorn. Fully two hundred of the permanent and summer residents of the beautiful old town of Peterboro took part in the various scenes of the pageant, which was given in a space cleared for it in the heart of the thick pine woods very near the little log studio in which Mr. MacDowell did so much of his work, and which he loved so well. Peterboro had been his summer home for many years, and his grave not far distant from his home is marked by a huge granite boulder surrounded by a rustic fence. The purpose of the pageant was set forth in the following note in the programme:

In two ways the Peterboro Memorial Pageant is experimental. Believing that pageantry stimulates local pride in past achievement, strengthens community spirit, and reveals unexpected artistic resources, those responsible for the Pageant wish it to help in demonstrating that for artistic and pleasurable results pageantry need not be confined to great centres, need not necessitate vast expense, but is perfectly possible for small communities. The Peterboro Pageant aims to prove, also, that color, pantomine, and music should count more in pageantry than the spoken word. Scenic effects have been omitted in the belief that the natural setting of this pageant would make these seem offensively artificial. Because of this setting and because of the use of the MacDowell music, suggestion rather than realism is the basis of the pageant.

Beginning with a very beautiful invocation by a large chorus, the first scene of the pageant brought from the thick pine woods the muses and dreams and then followed seventeen tableaux with musical accompaniments and very effective costuming. The background of tall pines above which rose Mount Monadnock made a natural stage setting that the most skilled art could not have surpassed, and the general effect was enchanting. The surrounding of his home were a source of constant inspiration to Mr. MacDowell. He worked in an environment that helped him to create such beautiful musical compositions as his Norse and Keltic Sonatas, his New England Idyls and Fireside Tales, and many of the songs and choruses that made him the greatest American musical composer.

The spirit of helpfulness was strong in Mr. MacDowell, and he had great sympathy for musical and art students hampered and hindered in their studies because of lack of funds. It was for this reason that Mr. and Mrs. MacDowell agreed that after the death of Mr. MacDowell their beautiful home in Peterboro and all of the acres surrounding it should become a centre of interest to artists working in varied fields. This gave rise to the MacDowell Memorial Association and to this organization Mrs. MacDowell has deeded the property, retaining but a life interest in it. A number of studios have been built on different parts of the ground and there is a large central house in which students lodge and take their meals. A moderate price is paid by the students who come here for study. It was for the benefit of this association that the Pageant of Peterboro was given.

Our Larger Audience

NEVER in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has it spoken weekly to so vast an audience as it has at the present time. During the summer months now closing, our Family Circle has been augmented beyond all expectation. New friends have come to us by thousands from every part of the Union. Old subscribers, who have felt the joy of sharing in the many Christian enterprises of the paper in past years, have shown their appreciation by bringing many others into the delightful fellowship of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, where they have met a cordial welcome.

This greater audience brings with it a due sense of increased responsibility. All these twenty years, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has stood as the champion of the old Gospel, the defender of the home, the friend of missions and the practical exponent of applied Christianity throughout the globe. Its late proprietor, Dr. Louis Klopsch, established it on foundations that were broad and deep, and he built into those foundations his own heroic life of self-sacrifice. With the active co-operation of its readers, it did a noble work in social and moral uplift and in the upbuilding of Gospel missions. It became the means of saving countless human lives, it brought happiness to multitudes, and, under divine blessing, it carried the knowledge of Jesus Christ and his salvation to thousands who were dwelling in spiritual darkness. For these things we can only praise God and be devoutly thankful.

With its wider field and its vaster audience, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S opportunities for service are proportionately increased. Its policies stand absolutely unchanged; its editorials are from the same hand that has written them for the last eighteen years. Its Gospel teaching, its missionary and benevolent enterprises, will now have a more far-reaching influence than ever. It is our aim and desire to keep up to the highest standard attainable, and, with the hearty co-operation of our friends, to make THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the best, the brightest and the most helpful and inspiring family publication that enters the homes of the American people.

A Nation of a Hundred Million

THERE has been no busier place in Washington all through the hot summer than the Census Bureau, where the director, his assistants and a multitude of clerks have been busily engaged in finding out just how big a nation we are. A year ago the census officials made the statement that the enumeration of 1910 would show that ninety million people, including our insular possessions, were living under the Stars and Stripes. The result of the census shows a marked increase over the highest figure suggested, and there now seems to be little doubt that we have a population of one hundred million, and that there are at least ninety million between the Atlantic and the Pacific. The additional ten million is made up for the most part by the people in the Philippines. The increase in large cities, those of one hundred thousand or more, is twenty per cent. on the average. According to Director Durand, the actual increase in our population from immigration is not so large as was expected. From 1901 to 1907 there came to our shores 6,219,000 immigrants, but all of these did not remain; 1,927,000 returned, leaving the increase from foreign sources at 4,292,000. Since 1907 about 2,576,000 came here to find their home and fortune, but 790,875 returned.

The fact that Greater New York is now the second city of the world came as a great surprise even to the census experts. The reports show a population of 4,766,883, making it next in size to London. In the last ten years there has been the astounding increase of 1,329,681, an enormous city in itself. The estimated population of London is 7,537,196. Paris, the third city, is now far behind, with a population of 2,714,068.

The results from all of the country districts have not yet been added up and it is not expected that they will show the same rate of increase as the cities. This is based on the theory that the population of the cities is increased by the constant flow of population from country to city. In recent years there has been a current setting countryward; but it is not large enough to equal the stream of boys and girls who rush to make their homes in the city. This inflow, however, it may be remarked in passing, has been a great thing for the cities. It is affirmed, with few to dispute it, that a goodly proportion of our successful men in our great centres were born far from concrete sidewalks and skyscrapers. They have come with strong bodies and healthy minds and the city has been the richer and the better for their coming. Now their sons and daughters are anxious in part to get back to the green fields their parents left.

It is years since we could be rated as a small nation, and our growth to a hundred million puts us, willing or not, among the greatest powers, with added responsibilities at home and abroad. Wisely educated and wisely led, this great mass of humanity can be a power for good. If not, the results are not pleasant to contemplate even as a picture of the imagination.

The Real "Best Seller"

A GENTLEMAN in Decatur, Ia., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, making this inquiry: "A preacher here stated lately that the reading and study of the Bible were on the decline—that it no longer held the attraction for men it formerly did. Was such a statement justified by the facts?" It is by no means the fact. The Bible is to-day more widely read than ever. Clayton Sedgwick Cooper, an authority on Bible-reading statistics, states that 80,000 college men in eighteen different nations are now studying it. One great organized Bible class movement has a membership of 350,000. Our Y. M. C. A. Bible classes last year had 64,960 Bible students. Throughout the globe, there are 27,888,000 Sunday School children studying the Word. Last year, Bible societies printed and circulated 11,378,854 Bibles. More Bibles were sold than any other hundred books together. It is now printed in 400 languages. China alone last year bought 428,000 Bibles. Our contemporary, the New York Times, in a recent issue, reported the last year's Bible output of the British and Foreign Bible Society at 6,620,024 copies. In the 106 years of its existence, that society has issued 220,000,000 copies of Scriptures and its annual output is steadily rising, last year's being 685,000 copies in excess of the year preceding. Of what other book could anything like this be said? If you pile in a single pyramid all the copies of the Koran since Mahomet's day till now, with all the copies of the Scandinavian Eddas, the Hindu Vedas, the Persian Zend Avesta, the Buddhist Tripitakas and the Chinese Five Kings, and add to the pile the hundred other most famous books the world has ever known, including the "best sellers" of all the ages, the pyramid, contrasted with the thousands of millions of copies of the Bible, would be as an ant-heap to Mount Everest. Like that cloud-piercing monarch, the old Bible stands alone in its majesty, its magnitude, its altitude and its serene imperturbability, unshaken by the assaults of unbelief and pointing out to man the only way that leads to heaven and happiness.

The "Divine Right" of Kings

EMPEROR WILLIAM of Germany, like our own Theodore, is something of a storm centre. He can be depended upon to furnish sensational material for the press of two continents when other sources are dull and unproductive. But, again like Theodore, he must not be taken too seriously. Orators who are apt to be carried away by the sound of their own eloquence, must occasionally be expected to say surprising things involuntarily, and without the slightest premeditation. The Emperor's recent speech at Koenigsberg, where he repeated in a new form his extraordinary utterance of fourteen years ago, concerning the "divine right" of kings in general and himself in particular, has aroused a storm of protest throughout Germany. Not by the power of the people, nor by the call of the nation, but by divine ordination, he declared, he had become the nation's ruler. Some of the leading journals stand this apparent reversion to mediævalism, so completely out of harmony with the spirit of the time as peculiarly inopportune at a time when international arbitration is being considered, and when the Czar, an advocate of the limitation of armaments, is to visit the country.

But the German people are sensibly conscious of the fact that William has never attempted to extend imperial rights beyond constitutional limitation. They know his love of strong, high-sounding, mouth-filling phrases and they remember occasions in the past, when utterances of the "mailed-fist" order were the sensation of the moment. Besides, the Emperor, in a subsequent address at Dantzig, has explained his Koenigsberg speech in a way that shows that it was never intended to convey the meaning or purpose popularly attributed to it. He now says:

> When I represented myself, like my sainted grandfather, as being under the protection of the Highest, and as working under the highest commission of our Lord and God, I assumed that every honest Christian, whoever he might be, did the same. Whoever works in this spirit knows well that the Cross imposes obligations. We should hold together in brotherly love, and we should leave to each race its peculiarities. The races and trade organizations should join hands for common work and to meet the State's necessities.

It is evident that the Kaiser, recognizing the indiscretion of his Koenigsberg speech, is endeavoring to remove the impression that it was a "proclamation of absolutism" by giving to it the character of a religious utterance. His explanation is plausible and gives to the affair quite a different complexion. Europe will watch the speech-loving ruler, and will no doubt be more careful about misconstruing his remarks, when he indulges in metaphor and hyperbole in future.

General Notes

—OUR LIST of newspapers that do not print liquor advertisements increases weekly. The latest additions are the Berkeley Calif., Daily Gazette and Daily Independent (Berkeley has 40,000 inhabitants); the Kansas City Star; the Des Moines, Register and Leader and the Daily Record and Daily Telegram of Greensboro, N. C.

—FOUR MEMBERS of a sect known as "the Disciples of the Holy Ghost with the Gift of Tongues" were found prostrate by starvation in Los Angeles, Calif., the result of a six-weeks' fast. One of the four—the Rev. John O'Neil Irving—died refusing nourishment. The others may recover.

—SENATOR GORE, the blind Senator, has made a statement vindicating Vice-President Sherman in connection with the Oklahoma lands scandal. Mr. Sherman's name, the Senator admits, was brought into the discussion casually and there was at no time any evidence that he was directly or indirectly connected with or even cognizant of the frauds.

—THE FLOODS IN Japan have been much more extensive and destructive than was at first reported. Information received at the Japanese Consulate in New York is to the effect that "the region which is suffering from the recent floods in middle Japan covers Tokyo and the fifteen prefectures of Shidzuoka, Saidama, Gunba, Chiba, Tochigi, Miyagi, Wagano, Yamanashi, Kanagawa, Ibaraki, Aichi, Fukushima, Iwate, Yamagata and Akita. The casualties are 880 killed, 160 injured and 500 missing. About 3,700 houses were entirely destroyed or washed away, 2,200 houses were partially destroyed and about 400,000 houses were flooded. The damage is especially heavy in Tokio and the succeeding eight prefectures in the foregoing list, the number of the sufferers who need relief being 200,000 in Tokio prefecture only. Railroad traffic was stopped at several sections. Both the central and local governments are doing their best, co-operating with the military and naval forces in relieving the sufferers and in repairing the damages. Relief work is going on satisfactorily."

Women Aviators

TO-DAY women are invading successfully every field of science and in some cases are ranked among the pioneers. Hardly had the flying machine been developed from the primitive "glider" of the Wright Brothers than women were anxious to try a flight toward the blue and disposing, so far as they were concerned, with the theory that the gentler sex are constitutionally timid. Most of those who have so far navigated the air have been the wives or relatives of flying machine inventors or of aeronauts who are enthusiastic over every new form of sport, providing it offers a spice of danger. In France Madame Paulhan, the wife of the most famous French "man bird," as they are getting to call them over there, became an adept some time ago in handling her husband's flying machines, and has sailed aloft so often that it is no longer a novelty. A French baroness also bought a machine and made some remarkable flights alone, but at last she came to grief. Her machine plunged from a height of two hundred feet and only by a miracle did the lady escape with her life. Her legs and arms were broken, and she was internally injured. She will be an invalid for life. Here in America Mrs. Glenn Curtiss, the wife of the aeronaut who won the $10,000 prize for his trip from Albany to New York, has made a number of trips. She is enthusiastic and has been of great help to her husband. Mrs. Mars at Hempstead has become proficient, and many ladies prominent in the social world have gone aloft as passengers. Among them are Mrs. Clifford Harmon, the wife of the noted amateur aeronaut, and Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney. Women by nature are supposed to be more timid than men, and yet in all times, in all nations, including those of Bible times, there have been splendid specimens of female heroism, both physical and moral. The prophet refers to the natural timidity of women when he writes:

In that day shall Egypt be like unto women; and it shall be afraid and fear because of the shaking of the hand of the Lord of Hosts. (Isa. 19:16.)

Florence Nightingale's Lover

A romantic incident in the life of Florence Nightingale is mentioned in a telegram of recent date from Fox Lake, Wis. It states that Miss Nightingale in her girlhood was the sweetheart of William Shore, her cousin. As the church canon of consanguinity forbade them to marry they parted with mutual vows of constancy. Shore left England for America and settled in Fox Lake, Wis. He remained single there. He died in 1868 and was buried in Waushara cemetery, near the village. The Angel of the Crimea in her English home waited patiently for the messenger that has just taken her to her lover. This pathetic instance of earthly love suggests the constancy of God's affection for us and the necessity of our unfaltering fidelity to him.

I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee. (Jer. 31:3.)

Fearful Mistake

James Peterson, after an automobile trip, took his machine to the garage at Greenwich, Conn., to be cleaned. The car had scarcely entered the building when a lamp which was broken set fire to the car. In pushing the machine into the street, Peterson's clothes became ignited. His companions made a loud call for water. A man passing by on the street just then saw a bucket of clear fluid in the doorway of the garage, and, seizing it, dashed the entire contents on Peterson. The bucket was full of gasoline and not water, and the fluid poured upon Peterson made a torch of him, and despite the attempts to smother the flames with blankets and coats, Peterson was burnt to death. The man was benevolent, sincere and honest in his endeavor to save Peterson; but there was a mistake which led to a fatal result. In the attempt to quiet the tempers, cool down the passions, and quench the flames of moral evil, many well-disposed and sincere people, by misapprehension of fact, use the wrong kind of fluid, adding to the fires instead of destroying them. Some of the most appalling fatalities in the moral and spiritual realm are produced by persons who are mistaken in their intellectual judgment and in their religious beliefs, and destroy rather than save those whom they undertake to help.

O my people, they which lead thee cause thee to err, and destroy the way of thy path. (Isa. 3:12.)

A Child's Faith

A Brooklyn pastor who was making an eloquent address at a Young People's service at a camp meeting recently, told this incident, which had a magical influence upon the audience. He said: "I was swimming in water thirty feet deep, and looking some distance up to the dock I saw my sweet little baby girl looking down upon me. I called out to her and said, 'Bet, jump.' Instantly she jumped out into the water before me, and I seized her and swimming around a little while with her brought her safe to the dock." Oh, what a good thing it was that her father could swim, and what beautiful faith the child had in her father that prompted her to jump into the water to him! It is this simple childlike confidence that the Redeemer requires of us to believe implicitly in his word and to trust ourselves completely to his saving power. The child's faith the Master takes as a measure of the faith necessary to salvation.

Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. (Mark 10:15.)

Postal Savings Banks

Plans are made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to put into practical operation the new law providing for the Federal postal savings bank system. Such a system is in use in some of the nations of Europe. That of England is peculiarly successful. It is said that in the United Kingdom one person in every four has a savings account with the government and that the average deposit is about $70. Under the new law the depositors will get two per cent. interest with the United States Government back of their account. It is expected that the first of these banks will be opened in New York and Brooklyn by November 1, and that eventually there will be a Federal savings bank at every post office. When the proposition was first made it was looked upon with suspicion by the management of the other banks as likely to come into competition with them, but the more far-sighted of them now believe that the postal banks will be of advantage to the individual and the community in general. The millions of dollars deposited in the savings banks of the country speak of their popularity and of the thrift of the people. The friends of the Federal postal bank system predict that such banks will be immensely popular and will be a great help, especially to those who try to save something out of small incomes. Christ himself taught the lesson of saving, especially in small things, when he said to his disciples:

Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost. (John 6:12.)

Gospel Preaching Still Powerful

Mr. Don O. Shelton, the head of the National Bible Institute, wrote a letter to one of the New York City daily newspapers relating practical facts with reference to the popularity of the Gospel with the masses, which is so timely and encouraging that we quote a portion of it for the inspiration of our readers. Mr. Shelton says: "A characteristic of the people of New York is the respectful attention which they give to the proclamation of the Gospel. In the last four years the National Bible Institute at crowded centres of the city's life has conducted many hundreds of evangelistic meetings, and the close and even reverent attention given to the speakers has been highly encouraging. This year our meetings began early in April and have been continued daily and nightly and on Sundays ever since, but they have not been interrupted in any instance except on a few occasions by persons who were partly intoxicated or mentally unbalanced. Last week we conducted sixty-seven outdoor evangelistic meetings, with an attendance, by count, of more than 11,000 men, and yet there was not a single interruption. We have not asked for police protection this year. These meetings have not only proved that the people of New York are outwardly respectful, but they have shown that the Gospel is still the power of God unto salvation when its message is declared simply and with the sole purpose of leading those who listen to lead a true Christian life. This is the more remarkable in view of the fact that it has been found that fully 75 per cent. of those who attend these meetings are not members of any church whatever, and that 90 per cent. of them are men. Another encouragement has been the fact that men respond to the appeal of the Gospel out of doors quite as quickly as indoors. There have been multiplied evidences this year of lives transformed through the power of the Gospel. Recently one of our workers after speaking to a crowd of about 200 at Union Square spoke to an elderly gentleman who had been attending the meetings for three years, and who said, 'You do not realize the greatness of the results that come from the work you are doing,' and he then related the following incident: 'A plumber attended one of your meetings last summer and listened to the Gospel message. The good seed fell upon good ground. The man was a drunkard and a bad man generally, and to make his condition still worse he was leading his nineteen-year-old son down the same path, breaking up his home and bringing sorrow upon his Christian wife. Both the father and the son were converted and they are now candidates for admission into the Baptist Church, where the Christian wife and mother worships.'" The reception of the Gospel by out-door preaching in New York reminds us of that by the people to whom the apostle addressed these words:

For our Gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance. (I. Thes. 1:5.)

IN THE HOME QUEEN'S REALM

Women in Council

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THERE is an old saying to the effect that two heads are better than one. If this be true, may we not imagine that sometimes twenty or thirty heads or that number multiplied indefinitely are likely to get nearer a right conception of things than one person may when acting entirely by herself? The home queen is a wife, a mother, a sister, a daughter. She presides over her realm with dignity and efficiency. If she has a little help to send anybody else she is graciously ready to do it, and here on this page she may find her opportunity. Write whenever you like and as freely and confidentially as you choose here.

Children's Environment "In an issue some weeks ago I was much interested in the letter of a mother who dreaded taking her children from the country to live in a wicked town. I agree with her that children are to be pitied if they know nothing of the wonderful beauty of the hills and valleys and the woods full of flowers and birds. There indeed we get very close to the Creator. Still sin abounds on every hand. In her case she might better risk the evil influence of the saloon later on than the harm that would be done them if the children saw any division between father and mother. The strongest characters are not those which have been shielded from the knowledge of sin, but those which through the vigilance of parents have been daily moulded in the fear and love of God. (MRS.) LULU S."

For the Victims of Insomnia "I wish to suggest a cure that may prove beneficial to D. L. M., whose letter appeared in your paper on July 6. I have been a nervous invalid for years, and was long a sufferer from insomnia. My physician prescribed the following treatment: On first retiring it was my custom to fall asleep, but I wakened after two or three hours, and would then lie wide awake for the rest of the night. The doctor told me not to lie still and coax sleep back, but to rise at once, take a little exercise or read a story that would not cause me to think too deeply. Then he advised my eating a cracker or two or a little bread and butter and returning to bed. This proved beneficial in my case. M. L. P."

Another Remedy "The plea of the friend who cannot sleep appeals to me, as I, too, have suffered in the same way. I have found that by beating two eggs and mixing them with milk, a little sweetened, and taking this before going to bed, I have been able to banish insomnia. E. L."

One Who Mourns Dr. Klopsch "The sudden news of the death of the editor nearly broke our hearts. Tears of real sorrow would course down our cheeks for days afterward. Not for him, but for the poor and needy in the world who need such a rare friend as Dr. Klopsch always proved to be. The cry of my heart was, How can they live without him? And now you are asking, would we like to have Women in Council. I can answer for one only. By all means. There are noble women in the land whose home duties would not permit them to be members of a club, or go to the St. Louis Convention, who would be more than glad of a woman's page in THE HERALD. One question is burning its way into my brain. Here it is: Is there no, absolutely no, employment for an elderly man with very poor eyesight and very deaf? Something to save the brain and prevent a total wreck? We think we would recognize THE CHRISTIAN HERALD staff if we never meet this side of heaven's gate. May they live to show to the world the spirit of the blessed Master. E. K."

Your letter touches a responsive chord. Long years will pass before the memory of Dr. Klopsch fades from the hearts of those who loved him, and those whom he was always ready to help. If among our readers there is any one who can suggest something that an elderly man burdened with the infirmities of your friend can do to help him pass the time usefully and pleasantly, the message will be gratefully received.

Young Girls and Domestic Help "I have helping me in my kitchen a woman who as a young girl was wild and unsteady. She went to church and Sunday School, but no one took much interest in her, and finally she was led astray. Since she has been in my home and I have heard the story of her life, I shudder to think of what she went through, and I ask myself if I have been as faithful as I ought in mothering such girls as she was? Had a mother held out a helping hand to her, had any one understood her and lovingly taken pains to guard her from temptation, the story of her life would have been very different. When we take young girls into our home as helpers in domestic work, do we not owe them something more than wages? Do we not owe them love? And if we refuse to give it, are we not responsible for their failure or success in life? A. B."

Small Boys and Sunday Afternoon "Will some one send me a good suggestion for my active little boy of eleven who finds Sunday afternoon tedious and long? He attends Sunday School and church from April until October. In the winter season we have no Sunday School. We provide good reading matter for the child, but he tires of reading long at a time. Surely some mother can tell me what she would do in my situation. "(MRS.) G. G."

It is too much to expect of a restless little fellow that he shall sit still for hours on Sunday. He might take walks or go on errands, carrying a book or a letter from his mother to a friend, and part of the time there might be singing in the family or story-telling. I pass this letter with its plea to the consideration of the sisters.

A Good Book for Children "I recommend for the little children a book entitled New Testament Primer, by J. E. White, Pacific Press Publishing Company, Mountain View, Calif. A. H."

A WEDDING IN MORAVIA, AUSTRIA

THE happy bride and groom are on the left and the marriage certificate is proudly displayed on the bridegroom's hat. Love blesses the pair and they start out joyously on the simple life of a toiling peasantry.

In this connection I would like to tell you all of a tiny booklet called The Mother's Catechism by Mrs. Anna L. Price of Marlinton, W. Va. In the form of questions and answers suited to the comprehension of young children Mrs. Price has embodied what might be called stepping stones for little feet, so far as an evangelical creed is concerned.

Taking Root Ethel's little garden occupied much of her attention, but for some time her plants did not flourish. She weeded and watered, she enriched the earth and she watched the growth of her flowers with a jealous eye. Yet they withered and returned her little reward in radiant bloom. The trouble was that Ethel had a passion for transplanting her flowers; she did not give them time to take root. There are others who make the same mistake in the home garden. They never stay long enough in one place to become really attached to the soil, and they never remain for any considerable time under the influence of a preacher, a teacher, or a good book. The result is that through continual change and constant transplanting they strike no roots deeply. The desire to be constantly amused and entertained, to receive new impressions and accept new theories seems to be in the air. It is unusual to meet a person who has contentedly remained under a single roof for a score of years. Almost as unusual is it to discover the strength and depth of feeling and character which were nurtured in the days when people stayed close to the old-fashioned religion, in which more stress was laid upon doing right and repressing self than in having a good time and gratifying every wish. One thing that we need at this time is quietness and depth of conviction. The two qualities belong together.

Heroism in Common Life We need not go back to ancient days nor read of Marathon and Thermopylæ to call a muster roll of heroes. The daily papers furnish stories of heroism which stir the blood and lift us above the commonplaces of the sordid days into a purer atmosphere. Two young girls, classmates and dear friends, lost their lives by drowning at Wellesley, Mass., on a summer day lately. One ventured beyond her depth; the other, who could swim a little, forgot her own safety and struck out to save her friend. Both perished, but the one who tried to save the other was as much a heroine as if she had succeeded. A fire occurred one July day in a tenement in Brooklyn. James McGrath, a fireman, climbed to the height of four stories, walked on a narrow ledge through the heat and smoke, and with incredible courage, in the face of terrific danger, saved an old man who was ill and unable to help himself from impending death. The crowd on the sidewalk called to McGrath to come back, but he pressed forward and rescued the man, counting not his own life dear. Both were saved.

A woman in great peril caught upon a Ferris wheel and suspended between earth and sky, was rescued the other day from her plight by a workman named John Carroll. He had a crippled left hand but managed notwithstanding this to reach the woman and drag her into safety. The man who sees what to do and does it with quick presence of mind and with complete unconsciousness of self is the modern hero. He may be a policeman, an engineer, a telegraph operator, a coast guard, a signal service man, or anybody unknown to fame, but the stuff of which heroes are made is in him.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—MOTHER. The little morning prayer you ask for is:
Now I wake and see the light,
'Tis God who kept me through the night.
To him I lift my voice and pray
That he will keep me through the day,
For Jesus' sake. AMEN.

"GOWAN"

By E. RYERSON YOUNG

"WE'LL simplify our work, Mary," said Mr. Baker to his wife, after their fifth ıan had left them within a month, ınd he and his wife had had all the ıilking and other chores to do, "and ınly attempt what we can do ourselves."

Mrs. Baker sighed, for she did not ke to lose her splendid cows, and that ras what Baker meant by "simplify- ıg the work."

"You know, dear, what is best, but erhaps we can get a good man yet, 'om," she said brightly and hopefully.

"I've given it up. I'll go and see Iontgomery. He was wanting some ıore milch cows."

"All right, Tom, see him, but don't ell for a week yet. Let's hold on for ne week more," she pleaded.

"It has nearly killed you, now, go- ng out there doing the work those agabonds jumped. I'm afraid one veek more would finish you," said Baker roughly but affectionately.

"Well, Tom, hold on for three days."

"I'll give Montgomery one day to nake up his mind about my cows," aid Baker decidedly.

Mrs. Baker had not been too well for ome time. She had been ailing all pring and the extra work and worry ıad not lightened her burden. May, ıer little seven-year-old girl, the only ne left to her, tried to be helpful; but he was a frail little creature for a ountry lassie and could not do much.

Little May had been trying to get a ›ranch of cherry blossoms, which were n full bloom, but had failed. She limbed the fence and, in trying again, he fell. A rough-looking, dust-cov- red man jumped over the fence and ›icked her up. He soothed away her obs, smoothed her frock and placed ıer again on her feet.

Mrs. Baker caught a glimpse of hem and hurried down the orchard. The mother's eyes swept the dusty ıan from head to foot.

"I like him, movver," said little May, ›utting her arm affectionately around he man's neck, for he had not arisen ven at the approach of the woman. He felt that it was a crisis in his areer and that it was the child, rather han the mother, who could help him. So he stayed by the child. "He picked ne up when I fell. I wanted a cherry ›lossom and fell from the fence. He ame and saved me. What's your ıame, mister man?"

"Gowan," said the man quietly.

"Mister Gowan saved me," said little May, talking quickly.

The cloud flitted from Mrs. Baker's ›row as her little one gave her an ıccount of her misfortunes.

"It is nearly noon; will you not stay ınd have dinner with us?" asked Mrs. Baker hospitably.

"Do," said little May, and taking Gowan by the hand, she led him to the ıouse. Mrs. Baker watched him very ritically. He seemed a second-class ramp, and more weak and dejected- ooking than the poorest. His eyes vere dull except when May addressed ıim; then there sprang up a look of trange tenderness that worked its vay over the face, and softened and ›rightened all its lines.

May ushered him to a bench in the corner of the kitchen veranda and limbed up at his side.

Mrs. Baker went in and continued ıer dinner preparation. Presently she ame out, pail in hand, to get water. Gowan saw her going to the pump. Leaving May, he hastened to Mrs. Baker's side.

"Let me," said he, courteously, tak- ng the pail from her hand.

"Anything else, ma'am?" he asked, ›n returning the water.

"A little wood, please."

Gowan found the wood-pile, filled the ›ox and then returned to May.

Mr. Baker came in tired and aggra- vated. He had seen Montgomery, who was delighted that Baker was thinking of selling his splendid milch cows. But Mr. Baker had also met his neighbor, Jones, who owed him money for some time, and they had had an altercation over the matter. He was therefore in no sweet humor when he reached his home. He saw the travel-stained man —another lazy, shiftless tramp—on the veranda. It nearly made his cup of wrath to overflow. He was about to order him away, when little May sprang into his arms.

Mrs. Baker came out and took her husband into the house.

"What's that man doing out there?" he growled.

"He's different, Tom, he's different," declared Mrs. Baker, and then she gave him a glowing account of Gowan's assistance first to May and then to herself.

"A rough-looking man picked her up"

Baker recovered his humor. He always did under his wife's conversation and the caresses of little May. But he laughed at his wife's enthusiasm over Gowan.

"Like the rest of them, my dear," he said. "Sweet just for a day."

"He's different. No tramp ever offered to carry a pail of water for me. or ask for other opportunities to serve; nor did any other man so attract little May."

Baker laughed at them both.

Mrs. Baker gave Gowan his dinner. He thanked her courteously. His hunger was great and he began ravenously, but when he saw them watching him, especially litle May, he ate slowly and deliberately.

When he had finished, he returned the dishes and again asked if there was something else that he could do.

"Wait and ask Mr. Baker," said Mrs. Baker with a smile.

Gowan sprang from his seat and followed him to the barn. He caught up to him, but Baker's manner was so dashing and absorbed that Gowan hesitated to speak. Still he followed him.

"Anything to do, sir?" Gowan mustered courage to say.

Baker turned on the man with a look of contempt, but he also saw the filthy condition of the cow-stable.

"Well, clean the cow-stable," he said shortly and hastened on to attend to his horses.

Gowan sprang with alacrity to the task. The trenches were full and he had hard work, but he now had a job and he determined, weak though he was, to show that he both could work and was willing.

On his way to the house, Baker looked in. He calculated that Gowan would be about half through—at least at the rate of the last man's working—but, to his surprise, the place was thoroughly cleaned, scraped and swept, and Gowan was industriously and deftly scattering straw for the cattle.

"When you are through here, you may fill the trough," he said and passed on.

"Thank you," said Gowan.

"He's a strange one, all right, Mary," said Baker to his wife. "I guess that he's new to the tramp business."

"I don't believe that he's a tramp at all."

"Never before saw a man sweep the cow-stable like that. I certainly shall try him. Butler, the road boss, has several tons of stone down the road to break. I'll see about the contract for breaking it and offer it to Gowan."

That night Baker told Gowan about breaking the stone and that he could work for his board, if he wished.

"Thank you," was all Gowan trusted himself to say, but he smiled to May, who, instinctively, realized that he was wonderfully pleased, and ran and clasped his hand with enthusiasm.

Gowan did his share of chores for "board," as Baker arranged, and earned "wages" by breaking stone. It was very trying work, especially as the weather was very hot, but he persevered. Passing farmers jibed Baker about his new man and passed all sorts of remarks about him, chiefly speculations as to how long he would stay. Gowan had nothing more than a civil word for any who spoke to him. His one aim was to economize his time so that he could be with little May, under whose inspiration his general appearance had wonderfully improved.

"That man loves our child, Tom," declared Mrs. Baker, one night after he had gone to his room.

"He certainly has eyes and words for no one else around here," replied her husband.

"I believe that he is a father and has a sad story. He looks as though his heart was broken and he is working himself to death on that stone-heap. You might give him a rest. To-morrow is Saturday. Let's have a little picnic. We'll say it's for May and that will bring Gowan."

When the proposition was made to him, Gowan replied with his usual courteous "Thank you."

Mr. and Mrs. Baker did little more than watch the gambols of the other two at the picnic grounds. May was on the go, Gowan was full of brightness, animation, frolics — such as pleased the little girl and called out peals of laughter. But when she curled up, tired, for a nap, he sank into deep dejection and had nothing to say to either Mr. or Mrs. Baker.

They wondered and did not know whether to be suspicious or not.

"He's got a sad story, Tom."

"Well, he'll tell it to us or go."

The next night, after all had been made tight and snug, and May was going to bed, Gowan, as usual, picked up his lantern.

"We would like to have a little talk with you to-night, Gowan," said Mr. Baker.

Gowan turned the lantern down, set it in the corner and resumed his seat.

"We'll wait until Mrs. Baker comes back from putting May to bed," added Mr. Baker, turning again to his evening paper.

Gowan sat there in silence like one on the border of collapse.

"We want you to tell us of your past history," said Baker.

"In her little good-night prayer, May especially mentioned you, Gowan, and hoped that you would stay with us," said Mrs. Baker with a smile.

"It's no good telling," pleaded the man.

"Then I guess there is no good of your staying here," said Baker roughly. "We cannot trust our girl to be playing with a man we know nothing about."

Gowan looked up like a frightened fawn. To be separated from May! It was not now to be thought of.

"It is hard to tell what I've come through."

"Well, let's hear it," said Baker.

"I was just an ordinary boy—a farmer's son. Life seemed slow on the farm and I went into the north, mining. I had a wild time. We boys called it a good time. We worked hard in the mines and then blew in our wages in the usual way. I had nothing to save for, nothing special to live for. But I saw a fine girl one day and it was wonderful. It seems a dream to me that I cannot quite recall how it happened, but she became my wife. We were very happy. There was a good deal of building going on and I

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

Reader, Topsham, Vt. Is it right and proper for a minister, who is married, to correspond regularly with young ladies, even if the subject is religion?

Such a correspondence is liable to give rise to comment and to produce conditions that might interfere with ministerial usefulness. It is better to avoid anything that might be misconstrued, to the detriment of all parties and to the work of the church, although a letter from a pastor to any of his parishioners, under ordinary circumstances, would be perfectly proper.

J. R. C., Beatrice, Neb. Was the mariner's compass in use in the days of Paul? If not, when was it first used?

McClintock and Strong, in discussing navigation in the time of the apostles, say: "When they ventured out on the high seas, they were guided, having no compass, by certain well known stars, as the Pleiades, the Great and Lesser Bear, Orion, etc." The invention of the compass was formerly placed at about 1302 A.D., when it is supposed to have been made by Flavio Gioja, a native of Amalfi, in the south of Italy. It is now certain that it was used in Europe in the twelfth century. Some writers claim that the Chinese had it two thousand years ago. The idea of "fetching a compass," which we find in the Bible, does not refer to the instrument, but to a change of position.

C. H. S., West Chester, Pa. How many years does the Old Testament cover? How many does the New Testament cover?

According to the best computation of modern chronologists, the Old Testament covers a period of about four thousand years and the New Testament (up to the close of the New Testament canon) one hundred years. It should be explained, however, that there are some 140 variations in the estimates of the period of time from Creation to the beginning of the Christian era.

Mrs. D., Akely, Minn. In Gal. 4: 22-26 (twenty-fourth verse especially) are the words "which things are an allegory." What does this mean?

The words, "which things are an allegory," are explained in the passages immediately following. The allegory consists of the resemblance between the facts stated in verses 22 and 23 and the events of the later dispensation, stated in the eight following verses. It is the allegory of comparison, the similitude of the two covenants, that Paul points out.

T. B. R., Liberty, Mo. Who was "the pious soldier, Colonel Gardiner," mentioned in Pike's Guide to Young Disciples?

Captain (not Colonel) Allen F. Gardiner was the founder of the South American Missionary Society. He was born in England in 1794 and entered the navy at sixteen. He resigned his commission in 1834 to devote himself to missionary work, and did noble service in South Africa, the Falkland Islands and South America. He died in 1851 from starvation.

T. L. B., San Sixola, Panama. 1. What is the name of Halley's comet and when was it discovered? 2. What will be the length of the Panama Canal when it is finished?

1. Halley's comet is the name of the comet which appeared this year. It is named after its discoverer, Edmund Halley. He predicted in 1705 the return of the comet of 1682, which bears his name. 2. The Panama Canal is to be about fifty miles in length from deep water to deep water.

T. O., Jr., Chillicothe, O. Will you inform me of the date of John the Baptist's imprisonment, and how long he was in prison before he was beheaded?

The exact length of time John the Baptist was imprisoned by Herod in the Castle of Machæras is not known. His death seems to have occurred just before the third Passover of our Lord's ministry, A.D. 28.

D. L. C., Kimbolton, O. Please give some information regarding the Aeolian harp.

An Aeolian harp is composed of a square sound-box of such dimensions that it can be placed just inside the window or in the lower part of the window. Sometimes the side from which the wind comes is slightly lower than the back. Piano wires of the different keys, or violin strings, sometimes the two in combination, are strung across the top of the sound-box. When the wind blows over these strings it produces weird and often beautiful sounds. Of course no regular piece can be played. It is named after Aeolus, who, according to the Greek legend, confined the winds in his cave. The Aeolian harp is said to have been the invention of St. Dunstan, but in its present form it only dates probably from the seventeenth century.

W. H. P., Washington, D. C. 1. Where is Sheba, the home of the queen who came to visit Solomon? 2. Was Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, a descendant of the former? 3. Was the queen of Sheba married?

1. Although some hold that she came from Ethiopia, she is believed by the best scholars to have come from South Arabia. Her kingdom probably included the greater part of Yemen. 2. No, their countries were far apart. 3. Very little is known of the queen of Sheba. The Arabs call her Bilkis (or Balkamah). The Koran has a number of fables concerning her. Whether she was married is not known. It was not uncommon, however, in some of the ancient lands, for a woman to occupy the throne alone.

A reader, the Rev. T. H. Lacy, D.D., of Blackstone, Va., kindly sends us the following letter from the rector of St. John's Church, Richmond, Va., in answer to a recent question in THE MAIL-BAG:

Patrick Henry's great speech, calling the Colony of Virginia to arms, which closed with the words, "Give me liberty or give me death," was made in St. John's Church, Richmond, Va., before the Virginia Convention, which met on March 20, 1775. Another famous speech was made by the same great orator in Williamsburg, Va., before the House of Burgesses in 1765 in opposition to the Stamp Act. History records no speech of Henry's at Jamestown.

R. A. GOODWIN,
Rector St. John's Church.

C. D. L., Wilkesbarre, Pa. 1. Please tell me how sake is made and something of its effects. 2. Are wines and whiskies sold in Japan?

1. Sake is a Japanese beverage made from rice and Koji cake. It is allowed to ferment for a fortnight and is then pressed through filter bags. No malted grain is employed. It is drunk warm and produces quick but transient intoxication. Rectified and distilled, it makes arrack, a potent spirit containing 57 to 74 per cent. of alcohol. 2. Whisky and wine are being introduced into Japan by our dealers. Their harmful effects are said to be already visible, though there is no official record of their importation.

W. D. D., Ottawa, Kan. 1. On the cross, why did Christ cry out, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" 2. Why did he call himself "Son of Man"? 3. Speaking of wars, etc., he said: The end will come "even in this generation." What is meant by the word "generation"?

1. It was the darkest moment of the divine tragedy. Jesus voiced his anguish in the expressive words of the 22d Psalm, first verse. He had submitted to the will of his Father, as the only way of accomplishing the work of redemption, and he was to drink the cup to the dregs and endure all the torture, as though he had been actually forsaken. 2. It was a title which he applied to himself many times and which bespoke his divine as well as his human nature. "He was the Son of Man, the Lord of the world and its Judge only because he was the Son of God." 3. The passage in Matt. 24: 34 means that the generation of persons then living, contemporary with Christ, would see the kingdom of God established in the hearts of men. Luke 21: 9 and Mark 13 relate to the coming destruction of Jerusalem.

E. A. M., Centre Moriches. Please tell me the meaning of "Mizpah."

See Gen. 31: 49.

Subscriber, Los Angeles, Calif. What is the meaning of "Erin Go Bragh"?

It means: "Ireland forever."

C. M. J., Dundee, N. Y. 1. For what are evaporated raspberries used? 2. Is Esperanto likely soon to become the world-language?

1. They are used for making desserts; for coloring jellies and lemonade; and probably for coloring alcoholic liquors, though we find no statement regarding it. 2. The Esperantists have recently held a congress in Washington amid much enthusiasm. Ardent Esperantists feel that it is to be the auxiliary world language for business and travel within this generation, but there are many who think this doubtful.

M. O., Norton, Mass. I have read that in the recent military operations in Africa against the Moors some of the Spanish soldiers used slings as primitive as those used in Bible times. Can this be true?

Yes; but the Spanish slingers threw small bombs or hand grenades from their slings instead of stones. It is said that at close quarters they are very effective compared to those thrown by hand in the recent Russo-Japanese war. The Spaniards from early in the Middle Ages have been noted for their skill as slingers.

L. Q., Nashville, Tenn. What is the correct pronunciation of Naseby, where the battle took place between Charles I. and Cromwell?

It is pronounced Naz-bee.

M. A. C., Hornellsville, N. Y. What was the Roman Agrarian Law?

It was a law decreeing an equal division among the Roman people of all lands acquired by conquest. The amount was limited which each person might receive. It was first proposed by the Consul Spurius Cassius in 486 B.C. Several agrarian laws were passed at later periods.

W. S., Fordham, N. Y. Who wrote the lines:

Thus grief still treads upon the heels of pleasure;
Married in haste we may repent at leisure?

C. N., Concord, Mass. Why do foreign correspondents sometimes refer to the Turkish government as the "Sublime Porte"?

It is the official name for the court of the Turkish Sultan. It dates from the time of the last of the Abbasside Caliphs, 1243 A.D., who fixed in the threshold of his palace a piece of the black sacred stone of Mecca. This door or gate became consequently the sublime gate or "porte." The Sultan's successors took it as a title for their court and government.

R. R. McP., Dayton, O. What is the translation of the word Boer applied to people in South Africa? Where did the Boers come from originally?

Boer means a peasant. It was given to the Dutch settlers who began to go to South Africa as early as the sixteenth century.

M. H., Fayetteville, Ark. When and by whom was the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky discovered? What are its dimensions?

The cave was discovered by a hunter named Hutchens, while he was pursuing a bear. It is a little less than ten miles long, but the combined length of all the passages is about one hundred and fifty miles.

M. M. A., Lansdown, Pa. From what language do we derive our word "ostracism"?

It comes from a Greek word meaning a shell or potsherd. If the Athenians wished to banish a man, they wrote his name upon small shells. These were put in a jar and then presented to the Senate. Usually the people voting had the names of several people under consideration. Six thousand votes were required to banish or ostracize a man. The man whose name appeared oftenest on the shells was banished from the country.

H. F., Buttonwoods, R. I. 1. What is the scientific name for the ordinary potato? 2. In what country was the potato first discovered?

1. Scientifically it is called solanum tuberosum. 2. It is a native of Chile and Peru.

B. B. M., Charleston. Did we have any soldiers' homes in this country until after the Civil War?

Yes; the United States Government established a home for aged and invalid soldiers by Act of Congress, 3d of March, 1851. It was built not far from the city of Washington and its first occupants were veterans of the Mexican War.

P. C., Jersey City, N. J. After what foreign State is the steamer Lusitania named?

Lusitania is the early name for the kingdom of Portugal. The present name of Portugal comes from Porto Callo, the original name of the city of Oporto.

J. D., Bath, Me. Where and by whom was the regular postal system established in this country?

The first regular system was started by the English Parliament as early as 1710. A general letter office was opened in London, one in N York, and several others in each colony. L ters had been forwarded as private ventu before then. In Boston in 1639 a post of was established at the house of Richard Fa banks, it is recorded, "for all letters wh are brought from beyond the seas, or are to sent thither."

Snider PROCESS Pork & Beans

QUICKLY and conveniently prepared and the housewife takes pride in serving them because

Snider Process Pork and Beans are Delicious

THEY are so carefully and so thoroughly prepared, in the special Snider way, before putting into the can, that they are like a different food from the pork and beans most people know. Snider Process Pork and Beans not only have a more delicious flavor, but they are readily digested, even by those whose digestion is delicate. The Snider process renders them tender, mealy, thoroughly cooked and flavory.

Besides you know there is no more nourishing food than well-cooked beans, richer in proteid (the strength and vigor builder) than any other vegetables, meats or cereals; and beans cost less than meat, although so enjoyable and nourishing.

ABOUT the pork used—it is the sweetest obtainable. A luscious piece of jowl is used in each can of Snider Process Pork and Beans.

The jowl is the cheek, you know, a rich, choice morsel that seasons the beans as no other part of the pork can do.

Then we add a just right portion of the most savory tomato sauce ever put together which is prepared from Snider's Tomato Catsup.

Serve Snider Process Pork and Beans on a rosette of crisp lettuce leaves—done in a moment—a delicious dish for luncheon—good enough for the best.

LIBERTY OR LIQUOR?

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE Epistle to the Galatians is a divine exposition of true liberty, in contrast to its counterfeits, license and anarchy. Because Paul taught that love to God frees from bondage to the law of God by making us disposed to do freely by innermost preference what God requires, instead of doing it under the slavish lash of fear, many who had not received this willing spirit of obedience jumped to the conclusion that one might do not only what a spiritual heart prompted, but also whatever a selfish heart desired. Paul's words, "free from the law," are hardly less misunderstood to-day, and "liberty" is still the watchword of slaves to evil passions. H. W. Blair, who was for many years the champion of moral measures in Congress and daily encountered the opposition not only of bad men, but also of some good men who did not see that there is no liberty to do wrong, has said: "The whole question of liberty needs to be expounded anew in this age of cities." And we may add that the most effective way to root out the false ideas of liberty that prevail is to begin with the children.

Liberty Not License

"For ye, brethren, were called for freedom; only use not your freedom for an occasion to the flesh, but through love be servants of one another" (Gal. 5: 13). Freedom is not freedom to indulge in selfish and sensual sin, but freedom to serve God and man by the spontaneous impulse of love, "for the whole law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." If we do not love God and our neighbor it will be enforced slavery to serve them; but if we love God as a Father and all men as brothers, we shall freely choose to serve them, as children rejoice to serve whomsoever they love.

"Walk by the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh" (verse 16). In the sixteenth century Europe was aglow, as with northern lights, with the cry of "religious liberty." There was nothing selfish in that cry. It meant, to many who uttered it, liberty to die that their children might have liberty to pray. In the course of two centuries that light in the upper sky had worked down into the lower sky, and Europe glowed with the cry of "civil liberty." There was nothing selfish in that cry. It meant to many who uttered it liberty to die that their sons might be free from despots. Alas! that "liberty," this word of heavenly glory, should now be oftenest heard in that synonym of personal selfishness and personal deviltry, "personal liberty." There is everything selfish in that cry. It means liberty to destroy one's self and the peace of society.

No Personal Liberty to Do Wrong

There can be in civilized society no such liberty as prodigals and politicians mean when they cry, "Personal liberty!" Nowhere in all God's world of law can there be "personal liberty" to do wrong with impunity. The only real liberty that can exist under the reign of law is the abundant liberty to choose among the various ways of doing right.

But so far as civil law is concerned, the solitary man, living far from any neighbors, is at liberty to keep a garbage heap at his cabin door, because he is not interfering with any neighbor's liberty to enjoy sweet odors. The story is so pertinent here that it is worth repeating, even where it is familiar, of the foreigner of the baser sort coming out of a saloon, who swung his arms about on the crowded sidewalk, until one hand hit the nose of an American passing by, who straightway knocked him down. He rose to his feet indignant, shouting, "I thought this was a land of personal liberty." "So it is," replied the American, "but your personal liberty ends where my nose begins"—a remark which, like a flashlight, exposes the absurdity of the popular idea of "personal liberty." My personal liberty is bounded by my neighbor's nose, as I shall find if I attempt to put up a stinking glue factory near a residence neighborhood.

This solitary man we are studying has "personal liberty" to make night hideous with drunken rage and revelry, for having no neighbors, he is not infringing the liberty of any one else to rest in peace.

But when that solitary man in the wilderness concludes that he prefers a more limited liberty in civilized society, with its protection and fellowship, just as a man exchanges a quarter section in the wilderness for a corner lot in the city, he exchanges his boundless liberty of solitude for the smaller but more desirable liberty of civilized society. What is liberty in civilized society? It is the ample space within a great circle, that is bounded smoothly on all sides by law, which protects the rights and liberties of others.

Legalized Mischief

Inasmuch as government's chief function is to protect property and life and character, manifestly it should prohibit a traffic which at best is unnecessary, and which in its total effect greatly increases the crimes which government is bound to prevent as well as punish. No law absolutely annihilates an evil, but, in the words of Gladstone, "Law makes it harder to do wrong and easier to do right." Prohibition in its various forms does that. The legalized saloon, on the other hand, makes it as easy as possible to do wrong, and makes it as hard as possible to do right.

Gleanings

Dr. William Osler, Regius Professor of Medicine in Oxford University, in a valuable article on the fight against tuberculosis in the Woman's Home Companion for February, says there are three great causes that "prepare the soil" for the tuberculosis germ—"three bads": bad air, bad food, and bad drink—alcohol.

Professor Taav. Laitinen, M.D., University of Helsingfors, Finland, in Norman Kerr Lecture, London, July 20, 1909, speaking from three years' experiments on 225 persons and many animals, says: "Alcohol, even in comparatively small doses, exercises a prejudicial effect on the protective mechanism of the human body."

What science teaches of the deadly effect of all intoxicants gives force to the following story: After some search among boxes and trunks, the baggage master dragged out a demijohn of whisky. "Anything more?" asked the man. "Yes," said the baggage man, "here's a gravestone. There's no name on it, but it ought to go with that liquor."

Edison, the great inventor, says: "Art will be increased and distributed as we emerge more and more from the dog stage. Society will have to stop this whisky business, which is like throwing sand in the bearings of a steam engine."

* The International Sunday School Temperance Lesson for September 25, 1910. Gal. 5:15-26. GOLDEN TEXT: "If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit." Gal. 5:25.

[The teachers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Million Bible Class earnestly request the aid of all its readers in increasing the efficiency of the Quarterly Temperance Sundays, which might be a decisive force in temperance warfare if the thousands of teachers were well equipped in advance for this important day. Preachers also should be asked everywhere to devote at least a sermon or prayer-meeting talk the same week to the subject and the superintendent of public education should be asked to have the public schools in that same week give unusual attention to scientific temperance education, so that all the uplifting forces of the town may be united during these four weeks of each year in the work of civic revival.]

Sunday School Lesson

A British speaker, calling attention to the proposed extra tax on whisky, amounting to a penny a glass, noted that that was just the cost of each rivet in a battleship, and that "every additional glass that his countrymen tossed down their throats meant a rivet." But from the standpoint of new experiments on alcohol, every glass of intoxicants means a rivet in one's coffin. Two men who started out with equal heredity, one a moderate drinker and the other an abstainer, will differ by seven years in average length of life in favor of the abstainer.

It is a great mistake to suppose that a man is not drunk until he is staggering or stupid. An Indiana judge, V. S. Reiter, says that a man is drunk when he shows the effect of liquor in any degree in his walk or conversation, or whenever his "common sense is disturbed." It would seem that a man with common sense would let liquor alone, which goes first of all to the highest parts of the brain, so much so that President Eliot has declared that in the light of modern experiments on alcohol it is "inexpedient for even a self-controlled gentleman to drink the mildest and purest beer or wine at his home."

Expenses of an Alcohol Slave

In McClure's Magazine for August an "alcohol slave," whose reliability was vouched for by the magazine, declared that he had kept an accurate account of his expenditures and during thirty years his habit had cost him in cash $61,090.88, while during the same period it had robbed him of twenty-four good jobs.

The Prohibition Year Book estimates that the average cost of liquor in this country is $91 per family. There are few other labor reforms that would add that much to the average workman's comfort.

During the strike in Sweden, 1909, when all the bars were closed to prevent disorder, the results in decrease of crime and vice were so remarkable that it has made an abiding impression upon Sweden in favor of prohibition, which is likely to triumph in that country sooner than in any other in Europe.

We appropriately quote in this connection the following splendid sentiment of John Mitchell, the foremost of American labor leaders: "The happiness, the security and the progress of the nation depend more upon the solution of the liquor problem than upon the disposition of any other question confronting the people of our country. The Government must soon take cognizance of the great evil to society that has grown out of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and it cannot long afford to continue its partnership with the liquor interests by accepting revenues from and issuing licenses to a traffic which is eating at the very vitals of the nation."

A good example of the brimstone odor of the saloon business was given to the world at the time when forty-seven miners were entombed by an explosion in Cherry, Ill. During this excitement the saloons had been closed, but pay-day came close upon the heels of the tragedy and the saloon keepers demanded and secured the privilege of reopening their doors, on the ground that they could not afford to forego the profits of pay-day, notwithstanding the public grief and excitement which made such an opening a social peril.

A Misleading Statement

This is a good place to refer to the infamous words that are often put upon whisky bottles. Because they are bottled in United States warehouses, though not in any sense by the Government, to deceive the people, and especially foreigners, into thinking that these liquors are pure and harmless the words are stamped upon these bottles, "Bottled by U. S.," which suggests as a moral for the future, "Throttled by U. S." That means, in the ultimate analysis, "Throttled by US." And that means no license. The philosophy of prohibition is that which the farmer constantly applies in his business—the removal of weeds and the building of fences. We remove saloons that our youth may have a more favorable environment.

The editors of the Sunday School Lesson Department find that the story given in the lesson of Jonah, of a modern instance where a man survived who had been swallowed by a whale, which was published with apparently good authority in the Literary Digest, has since been corrected in the same paper in its issue of February 23, 1907, a correction which had escaped the notice of the teacher who prepared that lesson. The greatest miracle in that book, after all, is that it is a foreign missionary book in the midst of the Old Testament, when the general feeling was that the only thing to do to a foreign nation was to conquer it, rather than convert it. So far as the story of the whale is concerned, it is given as a miracle. Inasmuch as one species of whale could swallow a man, the miracle implies only the unusual sustaining of his life in that position, and is neither absurd nor incredible.

It Proved Helpful

It affords us great pleasure to acknowledge the very desiral le premiums you sent us recently, namely, "Dreamland" and Before the Doctor Comes. The picture is simply beyond our powers of expresssion, and needless to say, it hangs in our parlor. As to the book, we had but just received it when our little boy was taken suddenly sick, and through the advice from its pages, it proved unnecessary to send for the doctor. To say we prize its possession is only a very mild way of expressing our appreciation to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its innumerable ways and means of helping humanity over the hard places along life's journey.

Success of the Gospel Tents

AFTER a most successful summer season with more workers than ever before, the work of the New York Evangelistic Committee for 1910 is drawing to a close. It has reached strategic points in every part of the great metropolis and the attendance night after night has been most gratifying to those who have the work in charge. The preachers have not been compelled to address rows of half empty benches. In the majority of cases the seats have been filled and the congregations have even exceeded the accommodations provided. The tents are recognized now as a permanent institution in the religious work of New York; centres of spiritual light in the community and valuable aids to the churches in their vicinity.

Rev. Arthur J. Smith, when asked by a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD if he could give an opinion as to the results of the tent campaign of 1910, said it was too early to give an estimate of permanent results, as they must wait until the churches were heard from. A large part of those affected by the meetings, and who firmly resolve to lead a better life, do not go so far as to join any church, and we can never know how many people have been reached and whose hearts have been touched in the Gospel meetings. "We endeavor," said Mr. Smith, "to get the people who have indicated a desire at the tent meetings to lead a Christian life, to join some church in their vicinity. One pastor has just reported that he received several into his church from the nearest tent, and five more are ready to join with them."

Again referring to the known results of the work thus far, he told a number of incidents which had come to his notice. He said that frequently men and women came to the conferences which were held in the rooms of the Bible Institute on Lexington Avenue, and told of the way in which they had been brought to Christ at the tent meetings, and of their desire to help the cause which had helped them. One woman of considerable culture, now a trained nurse, said that for years she had fought against God; something in her early life had embittered her, but she had gone into one of the tent meetings and had seemed irresistibly drawn back to the tent again and again. At last she had accepted Christ and found peace. "The old things had passed away and all things had become new." She was earnest in her desire to do something and gave twenty-five dollars from her earnings to be used in the tent work.

"We have made a great feature of our work for children. Special meetings are held for them several times a week. The children enjoy the short talks and the Bible stories illustrated by the stereopticon. When we believe a worker is thoroughly competent we send him out and let him get results in his own way. The other night while visiting one tent where a meeting for boys was being held I saw one Bible incident presented in a novel way. The leader of the meeting was reading to the young audience the story of the Good Samaritan. Several boys meanwhile acted out the story with much skill, driving home the lesson in a way the audience will never forget. The attention never flagged for an instant; wide-eyed and open-mouthed they stood on the benches in the back of the tent in order not to miss a bit of what was going forward in front."

When asked in regard to the part taken by women in the evangelistic campaign, Mr. Smith said that there were a number of women singers, and that women workers were very successful with girls and children. They had organized a number of King's Daughters Circles and these circles d not drop their meetings with the clo of summer, but met regularly throug out the year. A number of Hebre and Roman Catholic girls had join the circles and were regular attendan at the meetings, displaying as muc enthusiasm as the rest of the girl "Our tents reach all classes of pe ple," continued Mr. Smith. "Dow town they draw people who are dow and out, or at least who are extreme poor. Uptown the audience would r mind one of a well-dressed, prospe ous congregation in a city church. O of the workers who is in charge of tent at Canal and West Streets to me a short time ago that it was a su prise the number of men whom he ha in his audience who were college br and reared in homes of refinement, b who had fallen through drink or di sipation.

"One convert was in such a conc tion that when the workers determin to do something for him on his pr fessing a desire to do better, the co ductor would hardly let him get the street car. But the trust of t tent workers in his conversation w not misplaced. He has stood like rock against temptation. He w anxious to prepare himself for Chri tian work, and he went to the Mood School at Chicago. At the last exar ination he stood among the very hig est in his class."

The work among foreign-speakir people being again referred to, M Smith spoke of the meetings at t Bohemian tent. "The work for the is but a year old, yet the attendan has been larger than that of all t Protestant Bohemian churches Greater New York put together. Th addresses are all in their languag We also have series in German, Fi nish, Swedish and Italian. All ha been very successful this summer, ar the attendance has been large. Muc attention has been paid to the wo among Italians and the head of t Italian Department at the Bible Inst tute is in charge."

Among the Workers

—ONE OF THE most beautiful gifts receiv this month for our Children's Home at Mor Lawn is a donation of $132 from Vermil Chapel, 416-418 West Fifty-fourth Street, N York, received through W. H. Van Sternberg and designed to give a ten days' outing forty-four little tenement boys and girls.

A fe months more would probably effect a cure. I terested readers may address Miss Andrew care of Dr. S. G. Sewell, the Sanatorium phy cian.

—MISSIONARY T. J. BACH, of Maracail Venezuela, writes: "We thank God that now, after five years of hard work in one the hottest places in South America, and one the most fanatical cities in Venezuela, have t joy to prepare the ground, the still great joy to sow the seed, and also the joy to gath the fruit on the field. With every mail fr the interior, we get thanks from some one w through the reading of the Bible gotten fr us, or through the paper we publish, La E trella de la Manana (the Morning Star), h found the way to a living, personal Chri Last week we got letters from two friends the Andes, who say they have now taken stand for Christ. Week before last, I got letter from a friend on the Llanos near t Orinoco, and among other encouraging ne he sends us, he says: 'The 15th of May last had a meeting here among us farmers, wi the purpose of reading the Holy Bible.'"

—HON. WM. J. BRYAN, reviewing the rece World's Missionary Conference in The Outloo states his opinion that the churches are abu dantly able to bear the financial support world-evangelization. He writes: "There need to combat the doctrine that life is to measured by material prosperity and that ou a selfish ambition can urge one on to lar achievements. The missionary cause furnish an answer. Here is a field in which the hig est ability, the greatest energy, and the loftie purpose can find full and satisfying emplo ment. . . . In recapitulation, it may said that the two great lessons taught by t Conference are: First, that the non-Christi world needs Christ and his conception of li and second, that the Christian world needs t stimulating enthusiasm which flows back fr the mission field to strengthen faith, pur life, quicken the spirit of brotherhood, a purge governments of their inconsistencies."

Waiting for God*

THE soul realizes that the things of the spirit are too deep for the finite mind. It has a great faith, often gained through anguish and chastening. It cries, "Lord, I believe. Help thou mine unbelief."

Haeckel, the great monist and infidel, in his work upon The Riddle of the Universe, tells of the death of a promising young scientist, and remarks, "This one cruel stroke, whereby the world was deprived of an original and ingenious experimenter, is enough to disprove the theory that this world is governed by a beneficent being."

One almost feels as though all of Haeckel's blatant pretensions to scientific eminence were vitiated by so shallow and unintelligent a view.

Does he not know that out of the most crushing of apparent misfortunes are often evolved great blessings?—that without maddening tyranny, the spirit of liberty could never have been born?—that the crown comes only after the cross?

Take for example the life of one of the greatest and best of men, Moses. He commits a murder. It is true that he was defending the innocent weak against the wicked strong; but the sin of murder was then just as heinous as now, and in order to escape punishment he had to leave his luxurious life in Egypt and dwell in remote Midian.

Worst of all, the race for the sake of which he had sinned cared nothing for his self-sacrifice. Imbruted and dulled by their long slavery, they probably were incapable of appreciating it.

For forty years Moses dwelt in Midian. He had found a wife there. He had come to love the place and his work.

Suddenly sounds the call to return to Egypt. An angel appears to him. He sees the flaming bush which yet is not burned. God speaks to him and says that he must go and deliver his people from their hard bondage.

Moses pleads that he is not the right man—that he is not "smart" enough. But he has to go.

Was ever man so tried and worried as was he in the attempt to free his brethren? Then think of the long march in the wilderness; of the frequent murmurings of those whom he was laboring to help; of the treachery of those in whom he confided. It was an awful experience, and we cannot wonder that even his meekness occasionally failed under it.

These trials would have seemed cruel and inscrutable to the infidel, but Moses bore them all in faith and love. His fame and glory mount to the heavens. He waited patiently—this great poet, philosopher, reformer, lawmaker, deliverer—and God has given unto him earthly honor which shall endure as long as the world itself, and a glorious immortality beyond.

Job is another and an even more striking example of the methods by which God works, and of the truth that whom he loveth he chasteneth.

Augustine said: "If no sin were punished in this present time, men would not believe in Providence; while if every sin were punished here and now they would not believe in a Judgment Day."

"No view of sin and suffering can be correct," says Dr. David J. Burrell, "which does not take eternity into the reckoning. Our life here is but a small arc of the great circle. One day we shall look backward and see clearly that the sufferings of this present time were not worthy to be compared with the glory which is revealed in us."

"God makes no mistakes," said the saintly Henry Martyn, cut off in the midst of his work and dying in pain.

Though the vision tarry, let us wait patiently for it.

*Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, September 25. TEXTS: Hab. 2:1-4; I. Thess. 5:4-10.

Home Missions*

IT sometimes seems as though our older Christians were a trifle dull and indifferent upon this great subject. If this is so, our young people may well feel that they are doing a home missionary work in impressing in every way upon every community the paramount importance of winning our wonderful land for Christ.

The new census puts our population considerably above the general previous estimate of it. When we consider that we now have 100,000,000 people within our borders, millions of whom are for all practical purposes, and speaking from a religious point of view, as truly heathen as the South Sea Islanders, we get some idea of the gigantic task set before our home missionaries.

Sir Robert Giffen, the English statistician, ranks the United States as the strongest nation in the world.

"Not for one instant," he says, "can the population of Russia—double that of the United States—be comparable, because of the different values of the unit."

John Bright used to say, "America, if this generation is faithful to its trust, is to become God's right arm in his battle with the world's ignorance and oppression and sin."

Notice his conditional clause—"if this generation is faithful."

Only by our faithfulness, if his words were true, can this great work be accomplished.

Charles Darwin intimated that the whole world's history seemed but "preparatory for and tributary to the future of the United States."

If these great men were right, we must feel that the dedication to God of the vast power and wealth of America transcends in importance any other now on in any other part of the world. Let us strain every nerve to see that our share in this mighty campaign is done to the best of our ability.

In the masterly address of Mrs. Darwin R. James, President of the Woman's Board of Presbyterian Home Missions, in 1905, she quoted startling statistics of the recent increase of crime in our country.

According to the figures of that year, the annual ratio of homicides to population here was 115 per million, against 13 per million in Germany, 19 per million in France and 27 per million in the United Kingdom.

It is true that a very large part of these murders were committed by Europeans who had not been long in this country; but, all the more, we should bend our energies to the reduction of this terrible ratio.

There is no hope for the salvation of our beloved land from the evils which menace it on every side, says Mrs. James, except in an outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Let us pray that it may come.

In a noble poem, read at Woodstock, Conn., in 1883, John G. Whittier rededicated the nation to God, as our fathers had dedicated it in the beginning. He was ever an optimist, and these lines are among his most encouraging:

The fathers sleep, but men remain
As wise, as true, as brave as they;
Why count the loss and not the gain?
The best is that we have to-day.
Thy great world-lesson all shall learn,
The nations in thy school shall sit,
Earth's farthest mountain-tops shall burn
With watch-fires from thine own uplit.
O land of lands! to thee we give
Our prayers, our hopes, our service free;
For thee thy sons shall nobly live,
And at thy need shall die for thee.

That need is great. A hard fight is coming. It is not like the civil wars of history, but it is no less a life-and-death conflict. Let us spend our money and our lives freely in the great cause of home missions.

A Sound Public Utility Bond

Five years ago, after thorough investigation which assured us the bonds were safe, we bought and distributed to our clients an issue of First and Refunding Mtge. 5% Bonds of the WESTERN UNITED GAS AND ELECTRIC CO., serving an important and growing territory in Central Illinois. Our confidence in the continued prosperity and growth of the Company was well founded. Earnings have steadily increased (even during the period of depression following the 1907 panic) with growth of population and introduction of new methods of utilizing the Company's products. These increases are shown in the following table:

Fiscal Year Ending January 31st

	1906	1907	1908	1909	1910	Increase in five years
Population served	140,000				180,000	28%
Gross Earnings	$527,457	$659,983	$751,941	$790,637	$863,101	63%

PRESSED HARD

Coffee's Weight on Old Age.

When prominent men realize the injurious effects of coffee and the change in health that Postum can bring, they are glad to lend their testimony for the benefit of others.

A superintendent of public schools in a Southern state says: "My mother, since her early childhood, was an inveterate coffee drinker, had been troubled with her heart for a number of years and complained of that 'weak all over' feeling and sick stomach.

"Some time ago, I was making an official visit to a distant part of the country and took dinner with one of the merchants of the place. I noticed a somewhat peculiar flavour of the coffee, and asked him concerning it. He replied that it was Postum. I was so pleased with it that, after the meal was over, I bought a package to carry home with me, and had wife prepare some for the next meal; the whole family liked it so well that we discontinued coffee and used Postum entirely.

"I had really been at times very anxious concerning my mother's condition, but we noticed that after using Postum for a short time, she felt so much better than she did prior to its use, and had little trouble with her heart and no sick stomach; that the headaches were not so frequent, and her general condition much improved. This continued until she was as well and hearty as the rest of us.

"I know Postum has benefited myself and the other members of the family, but in a more marked degree in the case of my mother, as she was a victim of long standing."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WE have received several requests of late for a list of good bonds in which subscribers might safely invest their accumulated savings. As a rule we have not cared to specify any particular issue of bonds, inasmuch as the particular requirements of different investors have a great deal to do with modifying such a selection. As a matter of fact, our aim has been less to indicate the investment itself than to point out the principles upon which it should be made.

In many previous articles we have outlined those principles in their relation to the various classes of securities. For instance, in discussing municipal, railroad, irrigation, and other classes of bonds, we have outlined the rules to be followed before a purchase of bonds in any one of these classes of securities should be made.

But, in addition to the specific rules which govern each class of securities, there are some general applications which relate to securities as a whole, which should be kept in mind by the prospective bond-buyer. If the investor intends making but a small purchase, then of course he or she will be governed by the particular rules which apply to the individual bond which is offered for sale. If, however, the purchase of bonds is to be an extensive one, it will be well to surround the purchase with as many precautions as possible.

In making a large purchase of bonds it may not be found wise to follow the old maxim of placing your eggs all in one basket and then watching that basket. Diversification will be found the watchword in making the large purchase. Expert bankers can tell you what in all probability will be the safest investment that can be made, but this will apply only to ordinary conditions of existence. The most expert banker in the world cannot foresee such acts of Providence as may disrupt the ordinary current of events.

Diversification the Rule

Over periods of years conditions in a community may undergo a change, which it would be impossible to anticipate, and such a change might very materially alter the value of a bond issue which depended upon that neighborhood for its integrity. Whereas formerly it was the custom to invest one's entire fortune in one class of securities, it has in recent years become the habit of large investors to distribute their holdings over large areas and throughout as varied a number of securities as possible.

We discussed this question with leading bond house with a view determining the widest possible distribution coupled with safety, and highest average yield which an inv tor might hope to secure. The adv received was, to distribute the inve ment over the three following class

Classes and Subdivisions

Class I. Invest one-third in M nicipal and Railroad Bonds which a legal for Savings Banks and Trust in New York, Massachusetts, and Co necticut. This amount may again divided into thirds; part going ir Municipals; part into first mortga Railroads; and part into other und lying Railroads.

Class II. Invest one-third in M nicipal and Railroad Bonds of assur safety and market, but which yi more liberally than Class I.

Class III. Invest one-third in Pub Utility Bonds of assured value. this amount, one-half may be placed marketable first mortgage bonds transportation, lighting and pow properties which have demonstrat their stability and earning power. T other half may be placed in simil issues, including telephone and irrig tion bonds, of much narrower mark but higher yield, which are purchas with a view to holding to maturity.

Of course in instances which a governed by special conditions th plan could be modified, but as a gener thing it embodies a pretty safe rule be followed. The general investme is so diversified and must necessari be made over such a wide range territory that the danger of loss reduced to the minimum. Some these securities would yield a mu higher rate of interest than other The greater risk attending the pu chase of those securities yielding high rate of interest, is theoretical balanced by the greater safety of t low dividend-earning securities. Ar whereas some of the low dividen earning securities may be many yea in reaching maturity, others of hig interest-bearing capacity may matu in but a few years, thus giving th investor an opportunity to reinvest h money in a market which may ha grown more advantageous with th change in the times.

Of course, such a wide diversifica tion as that outlined above can onl apply to a large purchase of bond. But the principle indicated is one whic may be followed by the small pu chaser of bonds, who wishes to su round himself with as many safe guards as possible.

Celebrating Mexico's Centennial

free hair-cuts and shaves, and free laundries. City and people will both be gratified by their spick-and-span appearance when they meet on the opening morning of the celebration.

Extortionate charges will not be permitted, the government arranging just what prices may be charged for food and lodging. Every effort will be made to protect and entertain the stranger within the gates. The distinguished invited guests will be in charge of Señor Godoy, ambassador to Cuba, and the author of a very interesting life of Diaz.

The parade and pageant will show the historic events of Mexico. Thousands of costumes have been prepared with historical accuracy. The parade will pass through the main street to the Plaza before the national palace. There will be seen Aztec emperors, including the great Montezuma; Cortes and his steel-clad men-at-arms; monks, Indian tribes and Revolutionary soldiers. For this pageant of a day archaeologists and antiquarians have been preparing for years so that standards, arms and costumes may be accurately reproduced to the eye of th twentieth century. In the evening th entire city will be illuminated. Ther will be a magnificent pyrotechnic dis play; fountains of fire and a copy o the standard of Hidalgo, together wit portraits of national heroes, done i colored flame. Later comes the ring ing of the Dolores Bell. The cathedra will glow with 15,000 lights, whil 10,000 will illumine the palace. Th avenues will be hung with rows o electric bulbs.

The following day the Independenc Monument will be dedicated and ther will be a review of ten thousand o Mexico's best troops.

The celebration will continue unti September 25, when there will be sham battle under the direction of th secretary of war. Other events wil be a grand civic parade; the dedicatio of the monument to Benito Juarez b Vice-President Ramon Corral in th Alameda; dedication of the new na tional university, and the laying of th cornerstone of the Legislative Palace This structure will be one of the fines of its kind in the world.

"GOWAN"

ok up with mason work and learned e stone mason trade. We settled in ope. It is a pretty town on the lake. 'e got a house and lot, and worked rd and saved to pay for it. We had vo boys and two girls. We were very ppy and were just wrapped up in e another.

"Diphtheria broke out in Hope. any children died and our little ones ught it and, oh, it was hard. One ter another sickened and, in spite of l we could do, they died very quickly e after another.

"Last of all, our oldest girl, Maysie, st the size of your May, took sick. 'ife and I grew desperate. We had ery doctor in town. We mortgaged e house and had trained nurses, but at did not lighten the work and rain for wife and me. It drove wife d me to pray. Dear Maysie seemed rally again and again, but we could t save her. After she was buried, e health officer burned practically all e clothing I had. But worse still, ife took a wasting disease and, after few months, she too died.

"When wife died, I felt dumb, unned and alone! I sold the house, id the mortgage and other bills, and ly had enough left to buy this suit at I now wear.

"There was no building going on d no work for me in Hope. I amped town after town, but no work uld I find.

"I had tramped all day and had not had a good meal for two days when I saw your Maysie. She's the only one who has loved me since my Maysie died and I hope that you won't send me away."

"Indeed we won't," said Mrs. Baker, her tears streaming down her face. "I knew that you were a good man and had a sad story."

"I'm not a good man," protested Gowan. "I have mistrusted every one —God and man. But dear little May, with her arms around my neck sobbing on my breast under the cherry tree, broke the dark spell, and you have been so kind ever since."

"Kind!" said Baker, jumping up. "I think that I have treated you like a brute. I humbly beg your pardon, Gowan."

"It's all right," said Gowan, "if you will only let me stay with you and if you'll trust May with me a little while each day."

"I believe you," said Baker, and, as he could not contain himself any longer, he went out to commune with the stars and take a new view of himself and humanity, and God and life.

You may go and see Baker yourself. He will tell you, as he has told hundreds of others, that it makes no difference whether he is at home or away, the farm is well looked after, for Gowan is always there. Baker pays Gowan well for his work, but the only reward that he craves comes from the attentions of little May.

A Farmer's Wife Who Votes

HAVING lived for eight years in a State where women are allowed to te, I wish to say that I regard it as success. I cannot but smile when I ad some of the objections made to oman suffrage. For instance, it is id that women neglect their homes hile voting. I am a farmer's wife ith five children, and I do my own ork; but it doesn't take very long to ive over to the polls to vote. Of urse, we have to inquire into the aracter of the men for whom we te; but that doesn't take much time. 'e won't vote for them unless they are tisfactory.

I think women are in a better posi- on to vote independently than the en. They don't vote for policy, but ecause they think it is right. You ow how Idaho has been voting out the saloons lately; women have to take much of the blame of that. In the country and small towns, women almost all vote on the side of right. Of course, in larger places like Boise there are bad ones and there may be a few of that kind in the cities who neglect their families; but they would probably neglect them anyway. Women are not forbidden to talk in any State.

The process of voting is a very quiet, ladylike and quickly-performed act, but it is one that counts much on the side of right or wrong. Women are not in office much here, they are only at the head of the educational department. The State Superintendent and County Superintendent being maiden ladies, the school system is good.

CHRISTIAN MARTYRS GIVEN TO THE LIONS

CHRISTIANITY is the greatest fact in history. The early Christians endured martyrdom rather than forsake Principle. The picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, depicts 87,000 people assembled in the Coliseum at Rome to witness the Christians given to the lions. In such a scene may be read the inevitable doom of the Empire that ruled the world. The blood of the Martyrs is the seed from which Christian civilization sprang. If you would know the history of mankind—every sacrifice for principle, every struggle for liberty, every conflict and every achievement, from the dawn of civilization down to the present time—then embrace this splendid opportunity to place in your home the world-famed publication, CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS have shown wonderful appreciation of our great offer. We have shipped this splendid history to delighted readers living in every State in the Union. Next to the Bible, this is in many respects the greatest work ever written. In the past 20 years over 200,000 sets have been sold at more than double our Special Price, and every purchaser is more than satisfied. More sets of Ridpath's History have been sold than any other set of books in the English language. Can you imagine a greater testimonial for any work? No other history in any way compares with it. The English-speaking world has endorsed Ridpath's as the only History of the World worth having.

RIDPATH in your home means you need never spend a lonely evening. You can associate with the world's heroes; you can cross the Rubicon with Cæsar, after which Rome was free no more. You can sit at the feet of Socrates, the loftiest genius of the ancient world. You can kneel at the shrine of Lincoln, "the greatest character of all time, the gentlest memory of our world." It is ennobling to commune with these children of destiny. To be associated with great men is to be great one's self, and you will add to your store of knowledge which is power, and to the richness of your life.

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylonia's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendor; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written by man.

RIDPATH throws the mantel of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there—gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century—the most colossal world-figure of his time!

THE WORLD'S NEWEST KINGDOM

NEVER in all their stirring and romantic history have the people of Montenegro, the "land of the Black Mountain," just east of the blue Adriatic, been so happy, so exultant, as in the last few weeks, since their country became the newest independent kingdom in the presence of visiting royalty, ambassadors and statesmen and all of the Montenegrins who could possibly come to take part in the impressive ceremonies and general rejoicing. True, they have been independent enough ever since 1878, when, under the wonderful leadership of the Prince who has now become King, they beat back the forces of the Turkish Sultan from the valley of Zeta, and added almost as much more territory to Montenegro as the original domain. But Montenegro was only a principality, and the ruler had only the title of Prince. There are no prouder people in the world than the Montenegrins, and they have looked forward eagerly to the day when their beloved ruler should declare himself a king and his country a kingdom, ranking equally with other European States. The fact that the country was comparatively small could not be urged against the plan by European countries, as it occupied a very important strategical position, and its reputation for military achievement was far ahead of States which had many times its area and population.

A short time ago Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria proclaimed himself king and met with some opposition from the courts of Europe. In the present instance no opposition was manifested. On the contrary, Prince Nicholas' proclamation was hailed with expressions of pleasure. He has powerful family connections, and in addition his courage, his integrity, and his high, knightly ideals of the duties of his position, have already made him one of the most regal figures in international politics.

One of his daughters is the beautiful and gracious Queen Helena, wife of King Victor of Italy, whose bravery during recent earthquake disasters has endeared her to her people. It was Queen Helena, it will be remembered, who was the patroness of the fund provided by the readers of this paper for the destitute mothers and orphans at the time of the Messina disaster.

Another daughter married into the royal family of Russia, and Russia is showing her friendship for the new king and his country in every possible way. In fact, it would like to have the world at large think of Russia as the protector and sponsor of Montenegro; but to those who know anything of its history it seems as if the new kingdom, small though it is, with an area of a little over three thousand square miles, is perfectly able to take care of itself. It has maintained some form of separate government since the fifteenth century, though nominally a tributary State to Turkey. Under the present ruler, who succeeded his uncle, and whose father, Marco, was his leading general, Nicholas forced an acknowledgment of Montenegro's independence after a series of brilliant and daring campaigns, which reminded amazed Europe more of the conflicts of the Homeric age than of those it had seen fought in the nineteenth century.

August 28 was the day appointed for the formal proclamation of the fact that a new kingdom had been born in the Balkans. Cettinje, the capital, had been making preparations for the great event for months, to be able to properly receive the royal and other visitors who were to come, for whom the town had not adequate accommodation, and for whom special buildings were constructed or old ones enlarged. Before the first guest arrived it was as spick-and-span a capital as could be found in Europe. Visitors who remembered it in the old days when Prince Nicholas sat under a tree, and dispensed justice to his people like an old-time patriarch, were greatly surprised at the change which had taken place. The houses are well built, though markedly devoid of any attempt at ornamentation. The palace is a plain square structure, but of some dignity. Russia has an embassy building of great size, and Austria, her rival, not to be outdone, also has a large legation. There are large barracks, a cathedral and an opera house.

The streets are of great width, giving a good opportunity for the military display which formed an important feature of the festivities. Heretofore the uniform of the Montenegrin army has been their national every-day dress, a small cap, an embroidered blouse, over which hangs a graceful cloak of white, and new boots. All carried rifles, and their belts were aglitter with silver-hilted pistols. To suit his more exalted station, Nicholas dressed part of his small regular force in a gray uniform with Russian caps, while he himself, the Crown Prince, and his officers appeared before the admiring gaze of the Cettinjese in up-to-date European uniforms.

The Crown Prince met his sister, the Queen of Italy, and her husband at the port of Antinari, and escorted them to Cettinje. King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, big, burly and soldierly, also came to show his good will to his royal Balkan neighbor. One or two sons of the King of Servia represented their father. The parliament, established some years ago by the Prince, passed a resolution calling on him to assume the kingship, and the members marched through the decorated streets lined with cheering crowds to the palace to receive the assent of Prince Nicholas. The Crown Prince announced his father's acceptance of the kingly office and the crowd before the palace broke into a roar of enthusiastic approval. Later a Te Deum of thanksgiving was sung in the cathedral.

There were military reviews and gala performances, with innumerable celebrations in every village and town of the mountain kingdom. R. S. B.

REAL RELIGION

TEXT—James 1:27

THE thing we want to know about is religion; this above everything else, since it is religion that brings us back to God. Art and Science and Philosophy are important; but to be a Master of Arts, a Bachelor of Science and a Doctor of Philosophy all together would be merely an empty and transient honor in one who was not also religious, that is, a child of God.

The word religion is said to come from re-ligare, meaning "to bind back." We were created in the likeness of God but have somehow become alienated from him. As the planets were made to move obediently in their orbits, so we were made to live in harmony with divine law; but, alas! we have "transgressed," that is, crossed the line. In so doing we have exiled ourselves from God, like planets swept out of their normal pathway into lawless space. We have sinned; and "without holiness no man shall see God." The question of all questions now is: How can we be restored to him?

It thus appears that the search for religion is the noblest that can engage the energies of mortal man. But where shall we find religion? Take heed; for there are fabrications many and diverse passing current under that name which on examination prove to be utterly futile and vanish into thin air. The test is a simple one. A genuine religion must do what it proposes to do; that is, it must bind the soul of the sinner back to God.

The Religion of the Bible

For our guidance in this noble quest we have the Bible. It is a revelation or "unveiling" of religion. As such it is authoritative and trustworthy, because it was "written by holy men as they were moved by the Spirit of God."

And for our further guidance the only-begotten Son of God came into the world; as it is written, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; and the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." We perceive him walking through the Scriptures, from the first prophecy in Eden to the last vision of the Apocalypse, as the Teacher of religion. The theme of his ministry on earth was religion. The religion which he set forth is called "The Gospel of Reconciliation" because it presents a specific plan for the recovery of man's lost estate. The man who accepts it is homeward bound.

The religion thus outlined in the written and incarnate Word is defined in our text. James, the author of this definition, was the utilitarian among the apostles. He was a theologian with a clear eye to the needs of practical life. The religion which he outlines is marked by four qualifications. First, it is not one among many but the only one. Second, it is "pure and undefiled"; that is, not a mixture of truth and error but absolutely faultless every way. Third, it is "acceptable to God." There are many systems of faith and conduct which commend themselves to various classes of men; but the true religion is that which passes muster before the Holy One. And fourth, it does what it proposes to do; that is, it binds the sinner back to God.

What is this religion? The apostle here describes it; and by his definition three things are ruled out as non-essential and two are counted in.

What Religion Is Not

As to the things which are ruled out.

First, he intimates that religion is not a creed. A creed is necessary as a symbol of faith; nevertheless a man may be orthodox and not religious at all. A man without a creed is an invertebrate; but a man with a creed and nothing else is a lifeless automaton: for "as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." A creed is like a physician's prescription; a paper full of zigzag characters, having no value except as it stands for something. It is not this paper, but the thing which it stands for, that must be taken inwardly to effect a cure.

Second, religion is not a liturgy. Rites and ceremonies are important; but they are not the essential thing. They are, as Salter says, "the aliment of religion but not its life, the fuel but not the flame, the scaffolding but not the edifice." They are like the vial into which the apothecary puts the prescription; it is necessary, yet of no value whatever except for what it holds. To place one's confidence in the saving power of the Church and its sacraments is as vain as it would be for a patient to expect to be cured of a mortal malady by the vial rather than by the remedy within it.

Third, religion is not a confession. Such a confession is important: for is it not written, "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation?" The man who imagines himself to be a Christian without coming out into the open may well question the sincerity of his faith and the validity of his hope. An open confession is like the label on the vial. The law requires it: because there is no telling what mistakes might occur without it. But the label has no value except as it describes something. Lip service has a place in religion only so far as the lips serve the heart and the heart is true to truth and righteousness.

Now these are the things which religion is not. They are necessary as indications and concomitants of pure and undefiled religion; but they are only the shadows of it. Where is the substance, the essential thing, by which the soul is healed as when medicine —the medicine called for by the prescription, contained in the vial and duly labeled—being taken into the system finds its way into blood and sinew and expresses itself in terms of physical life?

The two hemispheres of religion, as set forth by James, are Doing Good and Being Good. And it is characteristic of this apostle of the practical life that he puts the former before the latter, unselfishness before self, beneficence before character.

I. The Doing Good is expressed in the words "to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction." The world is full of such needy and helpless ones, and our relation to them was indicated by our Lord in clearest terms when he said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

It is related of Palmaris, a devotee of the twelfth century, that in token of repentance he set out from his home at Piacenza on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. He had not proceeded far, however, when his Lord appeared to him in a vision saying, "I care not for thy pious pilgrimage. There are widows and fatherless at Piacenza who need thee; go back and visit them!" He was not disobedient to the heavenly vision, the legend says, but returning to his native town founded charitable institutions which have preserved his name in the odor of sanctity to this day.

Unselfish Service

It is clear, however, that the visitation of the widows and the fatherless is merely a specific term used to designate a general duty. The reference is to all unselfish service. Sin is self-seeking: the first step Godward is out of self into self-sacrifice for others. He who would be greatest in the Kingdom of God must be servant of all.

But, judged by this criterion, where is the perfectly religious man? Did ever one live in the world who so far forgot himself as to give himself wholly and unreservedly for his fellow men? Yes, One! He stands alone as the religious exemplar of the ages. He came not to be ministered unto but to minister. He was everybody's friend. He forgot himself in remembering the needy. He heard the cry of the friendless in the porches of Bethesda; he healed the sicknesses of those who were laid on couches along the way. Ministry was his meat and drink. His life is comprehended in a brief sentence, "He went about doing good." Its end was at Golgotha; where, in the one deed of self-sacrifice which set the pattern of beneficence for all succeeding ages, he "tasted death for every man." This is the hemisphere of religion on its manward side. Let that mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, "To do good and to communicate forget not."

II. The Being Good is expressed in the words "and to keep himself unspotted from the world." But just there is the difficulty. How shall one keep himself unspotted from the world? The spot is there! Among all the children of men there is not one who does not realize it. The "damnéd spot," as Macbeth calls it, is there and, despite all earth purgings, it is there to stay. "All great Neptune's ocean cannot wash it clean." How vain to speak of, even think of "keeping one's self unspotted from the world" while that remains, the ineradicable stain of sin!

The first thing to be done, obviously, is to get rid of that spot. Is it possible? Do you know of anything that can wash it out? In all the religions of the world, save one, there is no suggestion of any means of doing it. The only plan which has ever been intimated is that which points to the cross saying, "Come now, saith the Lord, and let us reason together; though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow, and though they be red like crimson they shall be as wool." A man who is truly in quest of religion will not be satisfied with any which doth not effect this purging. And if he is really sincere and in earnest, he will fall in with the one "pure and undefiled religion" which proposes to do it. Here is the proposition: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."

The fact, however, that a fountain has been opened for uncleanliness has no purging power except for those who take advantage of it. The remission of sins is offered "without money and without price"; it remains for the sinner to appropriate it. The fountain is there; he must wash and be clean. This means that Christ must be believed in; as it is written, "He that believeth in the Lord Jesus Christ shall be saved." He that so believeth is already saved, here and now. His sin is forgiven and his iniquity is purged. The spot is gone!

THE OLD HYMNS

By EDWIN L. IDE

I LOVE those dear old-fashioned hymns that mother used to sing;
A tide of tender memories to which my heart doth cling Sweeps o'er my soul in waves of love whene'er I sing or hear
Those sweet old-fashioned melodies to mother's heart so dear.
Ofttimes, when sorrow bears me down beneath its heavy load,
And rocks and thorns beset my way upon life's weary road,
" 'Tis then I rise on wings of faith," to Jesus' hand I cling,
And "Sing the Saviour's dying love," which mother used to sing.

I often hear the same old words, but set to music new;
Of course, the message is the same and rings out just as true—
But there's a chord within my heart that's throbbing all in vain;
"And sinners plunged beneath that flood lose all their guilty stain";
I know it's old and out of date—"A charge to keep have I,"
"A never-dying soul to save and fit it for the sky."
Ofttimes the words I do not know; but in my heart will ring
Some dear old hymn of years ago, which mother used to sing.

"I cannot stand where Moses stood and view the landscape o'er,"
But I expect to meet her there, on "Canaan's happy shore,"
And other dear ones with her, too; I'll meet them by and by,
"When I can read my title clear to mansions in the sky."
Sometimes I seem to hear her sing, when sorrow comes to me,
"Must Jesus bear the cross alone and all the world go free?"
And then it seems a gentle breath as from an angel's wing
Comes o'er me with that dear old hymn that mother used to sing.

ttended to, all the rest of religion, so ar as character is concerned, is "to keep oneself unspotted," that is, to refrain from sin. This is possible in only one way. So long as a man keeps company with Christ he cannot sin. Try it, if you will. Try to do a wrong thing while Christ is walking with you. No man ever did it. Sin becomes possible only when we fling Christ off. It would never have been written that Peter "denied his Lord" had it not been written in a previous sentence that "he followed him afar off." Our Lord has promised to keep in touch with him. In his sacerdotal prayer he says, "Father, I have kept those whom thou hast given me." That word kept is a great word; and the secret of being thus kept is in practising the presence of Christ.

Now this is practical religion, as James defines it. And there is one inevitable conclusion; namely, religion is impossible without Christ. One may call himself religious, may pay tithes and offer sacrifices and cry "Lord! Lord!" but he has not found that "pure and undefiled religion" which brings the soul back to God unless he has accepted him who said, "I am the way; no man cometh unto the Father but by me." You cannot go around Christ and get back to God. You cannot get rid of the spot without the cleansing of his blood. You cannot keep yourself "unspotted from the world" except as you are "kept" by him. And you cannot practise that unselfish beneficence in default of which religion is but an empty show without following in his steps.

The definition of religion is thus reduced to a single word, namely, Christ. He is made unto us wisdom and righteousness, and sanctification and redemption. He is first, last, midst and all in all.

It is related that a young ruler once came to Jesus saying, "Good Master, what shall I do that I may have eternal life?" What he wanted was religion, but where should he find it? Jesus said, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." His answer was, "All these things have I kept from my youth up; what lack I yet?" He had done his best; but had not found religion. There was something lacking still. Then Jesus, bidding him part with everything that separated betwixt him and the better life, added, "Come and follow me."

This is the sum and substance of religion: to follow Christ. For he is "the Way," and the only Way. All other ways are by-ways. All other leaders are blind leaders of the blind. Wherefore the only religion is the religion of Christ; since this alone can bring the sinner back to God.

THE FLIGHT OF TIME

JOHN M. MORSE

THE days and years go swiftly by,
How oft we hear it said.
They come and go like clouds that fly
So silently o'erhead.
'Tis morn—'tis noon—and soon 'tis night!
This earthly life—how quick its flight.

In youthful days it seemed not so,
We all remember why.
To Christmas time, how very slow
The days and weeks dragged by.
A longing for that joyous day
Made it appear far—far away.

We could not wait! so eager then
To grasp the longed-for prize:
But when the boys are grown-up men,
They see with wiser eyes.
The future not so distant seems,
The years have shattered childish dreams.

The days of youth and manhood fly,
Old age comes on apace:
What matters it to those who try
To win a heavenly race?
Well done! shall greet the faithful soul
When he has reached his final goal.

Come then, ye servants of the Lord,
Dispel your doubts and fears.
Hold fast your faith, and trust his word
Through all the fleeting years.
Let not their swiftest flight annoy:
They lead you on—to endless joy.

COLONEL ROOSEVELT'S RETURN

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

DID you ever see an eclipse? When the moon rolls between the sun and the earth we have an eclipse of the sun. When the earth passes between the sun and the moon we have an eclipse of the moon. I want to tell you about an eclipse of a day. The only one we have had for 134 years. The day was July 4, 1910, and the eclipse was caused by a great shadow thrown over it by Saturday, June 18.

Colonel Roosevelt, our one living ex-President, came home on June 18. Every man and woman in Greater New York was up early, and thousands of people came from other cities and country places, ready to greet the first citizen. Ships, big and little, went down the bay to meet the great ship on which he returned. When he came ashore at Battery Park the enthusiasm broke loose and ran over the telegraph wires to the ends of the world. More than 10,000 dollars were spent in the "welcome home." And it paid! It was a greater day than the Fourth of July.

NOT one story, but three, I shall tell you about that day.

When the great parade started up Broadway the Abernathy boys, who had ridden from Oklahoma, wanted to be with the Rough Riders. Surely they deserved to be there, for two boys, one aged ten years and the other six, who could ride 2,500 miles on horseback are surely Rough Rider Kids. But for some strange reason the Rough Riders did not want them in their company. Somebody appealed to the Colonel, who said they had better obey orders and go where they were placed. So they were obliged to ride with the Spanish War Veterans. I am sure Colonel Roosevelt wanted the boys to ride with the Rough Riders, but those who were in authority thought differently, and the boys were taught one of the greatest lessons of their lives: that was, "To Obey Orders." There are many times when boys and girls are in the right, but if some one in authority has commanded otherwise, then the best and only thing for the Junior to do is to obey orders. Obedience is better than having your rights. When you learn to obey you have learned the greatest lesson any school in this great world can teach.

THERE was another incident that my Juniors want to remember.

Just before the Colonel's carriage turned into Fourth Street a messenger boy, named Jacob Youngsivsky, succeeded in getting close enough to the carriage to get a warm hand-shake from the hero of the day. Off he ran and soon returned with a bunch of flowers, which he handed to the Colonel. You will easily guess by this boy's name that his parents were not born in Boston. He is one of the millions of boys in our country, whose parents were born in foreign lands, but whose children are growing into good American citizens. Colonel Roosevelt probably saw on this boy's face to what class he belonged, and by giving him his hand lifted him, and all the other boys of his class, into enthusiastic lovers of America. When the boy hurried off and brought back some flowers, it revealed the spirit of gratitude, which should be in every child's heart, the spirit that makes the child worthy of becoming a good citizen. All should recognize such boys as the coming Americans.

THE other incident which you will enjoy, occurred at Washington Square. There the tiniest trooper in the parade, aged five years, joined the riders near the Colonel's carriage. Colonel Roosevelt laughed, but as he saw the boy had forced himself into a better position than the Abernathy boys, the Colonel scowled fiercely. This was not "fair play," and I think Colonel Roosevelt was a greater man when demanding fair play for boys than when, as President, he demanded fair play for men.

There was one big blunder in the great New York parade. While there were children here and there in the parade, the committee overlooked the joy the hero would receive by seeing several hundred children marching together in honor of his return. A woman standing on the stoop of a Fourth Street house with a baby in each arm got an approving smile from the Colonel, who also held up his right hand with two fingers extended. Later another woman with three children got the salute with three fingers extended.

On the evening of that same day the Colonel returned to his summer home at Oyster Bay. Here the people knew the Colonel's love of children better than we know it in New York. Hundreds of children were waiting for him at the station and marched with their flags, floated by their cheers, on the way to Sagamore Hill. The Colonel noticed the grown people, but at sight of the children he stretched himself to full length and said, "De-lighted!"

IN his address at Sagamore Hill, he said, "I enjoyed hearing the children sing." Then he said something the children will never forget: "I am glad to see you all again, men, women, and little Oysters." This was a splendid nickname for the children of Oyster Bay. Surely he made them very proud in the next sentence, when, speaking of his need of rest he said, "I want to close up like a native Oyster." Every child would understand that the Big Oyster was going to rest for a little time and that the Little Oysters could open their mouths and enjoy everything they could find to enjoy along the shore of Oyster Bay. September ends the Oyster's rest.

In Africa the Colonel never shot or injured a baby Elephant, a girl Hippopotamus or a boy Tiger. Three cheers for the returning conqueror and Lover of Children.

Cecil Rhodes as a Judge of Men

INHAMBANE is a Portuguese province on the southeast coast of Africa, about five hundred miles north of Natal. When the writer went there in 1883, the light of the Gospel had never entered. There was no Protestant mission, no Bible, no written language of the people. There was, however, a pretentious Catholic cathedral in the town.

We received a formal message from the governor informing us that the public preaching or teaching of religion was not permitted by the laws of Portugal, except under the authority of the Catholic bishop. The people themselves were dead to any spiritual interest. They would not come to our meetings or allow their children to come to our school unless we paid them for it.

But a way was opened. The law did not interfere in domestic affairs. Any one might worship or teach in his own family according to the dictates of his conscience, and there was no objection to making the family as large as possible. The natives were willing to come to work for us for the small wages of the country, so we soon had a large family. We had to find them work; but this was not difficult. We received no grant from the mission or money from any foreign source for the wages we paid. Nevertheless, the profit on the industries engaged in left a little balance to our credit. At the same time, in one year we taught the forty people we had with us to read and write in their own language, and about half of them were converted. Some have stood to the present day.

One of them, Rev. Zizora Navessa, is the only ordained native minister in that part of the country. He was so clever that I made him the printer of the mission. In three months he could read handwriting and set it up in type and bring me the proof like a journeyman printer. Some years afterward, as I was passing up the coast on the same steamer with Cecil Rhodes, the great empire-builder of South Africa, he picked Zizora out of a crowd of blacks standing on the shore, and said:

"That is a good nigger! I can tell a good nigger when I see his face."

Our work at Inhambane was interrupted by a native war and we were transferred to another field. But it has since been taken up by other societies; the Bible is being published in the dialects we reduced to writing, and the whole region is being evangelized. The Methodists alone claim over 2,000 converts.

Providence has now cast our work in another field, viz., among the Zulus in Natal. The advantages for an industrial mission are even greater in Natal than at Inhambane. The Zulus are the highest type of native Africans. It is a better climate, no malaria as at Inhambane; a better soil and a better market for the products of industry. Ours is an independent enterprise, but the people espouse it with enthusiasm. We have formed a joint stock company, and over 500 of the most advanced Zulus have taken shares. Most of the money will be subscribed in shares by the natives themselves, and with God's blessing the enterprise conceived in prayer will soon be more than self-supporting. Considerable outlay will be required meanwhile in order to get our industrial plant into operation, and we will be glad of any assistance from American friends through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. W. C. WILCOX.

A Beautiful Gift

Dear Editor: Just a line to acknowledge receipt of one of the prettiest little gifts I have ever received, namely, the Red Letter Testament. It is a thing of beauty, and is much prized by me. I am glad that it is in your heart to give a premium of that kind, which is sure to be fully appreciated and to prove a blessing to many lives. HARRY S. HOLBROOK.

OCEAN GROVE'S LOVE FEAST

THE great camp-meeting at Ocean Grove opened on Friday evening, August 26, with the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which had been preceded by a consecration service at three o'clock. Five thousand were present at the sacramental service, of whom fully one-fifth were communicants. Bishop Luther B. Wilson, chairman of the Ocean Grove Devotional Committee, presided, and many clergymen assisted in administering the communion.

Dr. A. E. Ballard presided at the sunrise meeting at 5.45 the next morning, and also at the Family Worship service at 6.45. At nine o'clock Bishop Wilson conducted a "Holiness" meeting, making a powerful exhortation. At the same time a crowded meeting especially for young people was in progress in the Temple. Dr. C. L. Mead usually presided over the Young People's meetings. At one of them he spoke with especial force upon "Remnants," saying in part:

"As dirty rags are made over into clean white paper, and these bear often messages of love, so the remnants of humanity, the wrecks and ruins who are a burden to themselves and to society, may be made over into pure, clean persons, through the grace of God."

At nine o'clock also, a Fellowship or Helping Hand meeting was conducted by Miss Lizzie Sharp in Thornley Chapel. During the day other meetings were held in charge of Rev. W. G. Bennett and Mrs. Elizabeth Smith.

Pentacostal prayer services were held every afternoon at four in the Temple. Of these Dr. and Mrs. Wheeler were the leaders. Twilight revival meetings were under the charge of Miss Helen Gertrude Rumsey. Miss Rumsey was a prominent delegate to the recent Glasgow World Convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. Miss Ruth Harris of Cooperstown assisted her, singing with great acceptance.

The preaching at the Camp-meeting was of a high order. Bishop Wilson's sermons were full of good things. Here are a few of them: "If I were called upon to write a prescription for nervous prostration, I would order some sacred songs, mixed with the joy of the Holy Spirit, to be taken three times a day. Live right and you will be sweeping toward those gates. Live wrong and you will be sweeping away from them. Christ is watching you in the store, the shop, the home, yearning for your souls. There are women here who spend their days in playing bridge whist and their nights in folly, bowing always to the image of fashion. If you are crowded out of the world's society by obeying Jesus, you will be crowded into a better fellowship."

The Auditorium at Ocean Grove

Rev. Dr. L. W. Munhall has been the Bible Class teacher this year. The average attendance upon its sessions has been 2,500, and the results most gratifying.

Mr. and Mrs. Hudson of Philadelphia were in charge of the Sunday School, which was also largely attended, and from which many conversions were reported.

At one of the Testimony Meetings, an engineer said that many of his comrades were walking in the narrow way. Bishop Wilson remarked that every traveler felt safer when he knew that the man in the cab was a Christian.

On Saturday morning one of the greatest revival sermons was preached by Rev. Dr. Charles Babcock, a Quaker evangelist of Old Point Comfort. Hundreds were in tears when he concluded.

The last two days of the meeting were full of the power of God. Bishop Wilson seemed to lead the hosts to the very foot of Calvary. On Sunday, from the first early meeting until eleven o'clock at night, there was a continual shout of victory in the camp.

At nine o'clock the great love feast was opened. Dr. Munhall led in prayer and then Bishop Wilson suggested that instead of partaking of the bread and wine, Christian fellowship should be expressed by shaking hands. The people responded amid great enthusiasm. Among those who testified were Mrs. Stokes, widow of the first president of Ocean Grove; I. J. Bradley; Bleecker Stirling, secretary of the Bible Class; Cassie Smith and Grace W. Davis, evangelists; Rev. Joseph W. Wardle of Chicago; Mrs. Alfred Cookman, widow of the distinguished preacher, and George B. Lister, eighty-two years old, who gave his testimony in shouts and praises.

Finally, Bishop Wilson suggested sentence-testimonies. Many were given. One was, "Forty years Pennsylvania Railroad engineer, thirty-two years an engineer on Christ's train, on which the Pullman cars are free"; another was, "I'm on an airship for glory"; and "This day is like those when John Inskip and Alfred Cookman were here."

The hymns were sung with great feeling. More than 10,000 people were gathered to hear Bishop Wilson's last great sermon. He goes to Africa on a mission in December.

The "March Around Zion" then took place, Dr. Ballard and Dr. Alday leading, to the music of "We Are Marching to Zion."

Then twelve o'clock closed the great Camp-meeting of 1910.

THE BABY PARADE AT ASBURY PARK

ONE of the most interesting of the seaside resort displays is the annual Baby Parade at Asbury Park. Twice postponed this year on account of rain, it finally took place on Labor Day, in the presence of an enormous crowd of spectators, variously estimated at from 75,000 to twice that number. Forming a line from five to seven deep, they bordered the entire route, while fully ten thousand of them were seated in the great amphitheatre.

Governor Fort of New Jersey was present with all his staff. Many members of the State legislature also occupied boxes in the great stadium. The line of march occupied about half a mile. Thousands of visitors came in by every train especially to view the parade.

Mounted heralds with the blare of trumpets dashed along the line, announcing the approach of Queen Titania in her shell-like chariot of gold, drawn by six milk-white thoroughbreds. The beautiful young woman who had been chosen for this important office, Miss Lillian E. Sexton, looked every inch the royal personage she was supposed to represent. With her were her court of pretty maids of honor, and 100 gallant knights. They were stationed in a large pavilion set in a wooded glen. The charming little procession was divided into eight sections. Marshaled at the Arcade, the babies passed a block north of the amphitheatre.

Passing the Queen and her court, the gayly clad little ones completed a great circle, walking upon the snow-white canvas with which the whole long course was carpeted. Something of the amusing variety of characters represented may be imagined when one learns that among them were Topsies, clowns, Pucks, college athletes, chanticlers, fairies, Teddy Roosevelts, Columbias, Queens of the Day, Queens of the Night, Happy Hooligans, Maids of Orleans, Katzenjammer Kids, little Quakeresses, convalescing Mayor Gaynors, and scores of others, about six hundred and fifty happy children marching or riding in the line.

In awarding the prizes various considerations influenced the decisions. Originality or beauty of design were naturally the most important. Quaintness, magnificence of ensemble, or the individual charm of the little masqueraders, also entered into the question. The trophies ranged from an automobile, gold watches, a thoroughbred hackney and basket runabout, with trappings, to loving cups of gold and silver galore, besides innumerable baby outfits and many other useful and ornamental gifts, of trifling value in themselves, but immensely prized by the recipients. The committee had invested $6,000 in these awards.

The People's Prize of a $1,200 automobile went to little Stanley Krantz, aged four, who was seated in an aeroplane driven by its own motor. The Grand Prize, a gold loving cup, went to the Kaltenbach Sisters of Jacksonville, Fla. Little Mary, aged five, drew her two-year-old sister, Ruth, in a tiny carriage, in which, encased in a velvet box of royal blue, lay a great gold ring. Set in this ring with the legend "Our Jewel" beneath her was the tiny Ruth. More than a dozen pairs of twins figured in the procession, several of them receiving prizes.

There has probably never before been presented in our country or in the world so gorgeous and brilliant a baby show.

IN THE CHANGING EAST

Dwellers in the Valley of Kidron

Moslem Ulemas at the Door of an Arabic Library

Water-Carriers With Skin Casks

By SHIBLY JAMAL, of Jerusalem

IN the West, people are accustomed to think of the East as immutable, as a region where changes are unknown; where, from one generation to another, men go on living in the same old way, work with the same tools, and think the same thoughts. But the once "unchanging East" is quickly changing nowadays. It is becoming the land of rapid revolutions, of almost instantaneous transitions, and of political, social and religious turmoil and unrest.

To show how these changes are transforming the once quiet and uneventful lives of men and women is the purpose of these lines.

When the Turkish Revolution was over, there flowed over the Ottoman people a strong wave of revived energy. Men who formerly had been afraid to raise their voices in the presence of their kind, now stood on chairs and boxes in the streets and harangued the crowds.

Then the press caught the infection, and in less than six months hundreds of newspapers came into being. Almost every village now boasts of its paper. In some large towns a score or more of daily journals have replaced the once poor, censored, tongue-tied, ever cautious, dry weekly bulletin.

In Palestine and Syria, particularly, a religious revolt against the higher clergy followed immediately upon the heels of the greater political revolution. Of this little has been mentioned in American journals because events at Constantinople monopolized the world's attention.

Briefly the case is this: For generations past the Hellenic clergy of the Greek Orthodox Church, better known as the "Brotherhood of the Holy Sepulchre," have been buying up, acquiring and zealously guarding all the principal sacred sites and shrines in the Holy Land. Thus the "Church of the Holy Sepulchre" at Jerusalem, the "Church of the Nativity" at Bethlehem, the "Chapel of the Virgin" in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and many other shrines had become the source of an immense income which flowed in from Russian, Greek, Bulgarian and Rumanian pilgrims, and which the Hellenic clergy kept and spent upon their relatives and themselves. The poor native Syrian Greek Orthodox was kept in ignorance and poverty. If he was helped at all it was rather with the idea of having him pauperized so that he should become more dependent on the convent's charity and therefore more submissive to its will.

While the old régime lasted gold flowed from Jerusalem into the pockets of Turkish officials at the capital, and the poor native pleaded and cried in vain. But times changed, and the whole Greek Orthodox native population rose as one man claiming a share in the great yearly income. They asked for the establishment of schools, colleges, hospitals, old men's and women's homes; for the admission of their priests and young men into the ranks of the higher clergy (Archimandrites, Bishops, and Patriarchs, dignities which the Hellenes had proudly and zealously arrogated to themselves); for a voice on the Financial Board, and for many other similar privileges.

The Hellenic clergy wisely gave in on some minor points, but held back on all financial matters. To yield here would mean their ruin.

For the past two years the fight has been carried on. At one time an open riot was threatened in the streets of the Holy City. Then the storm-centre shifted to Constantinople, where it still is.

During this long period, however, the Greek churches in the land have been empty of worshipers, the natives having vowed never again to enter a church until their claims are heeded.

Since the larger part of Turkey is essentially agricultural, great strides have been made along this line. Farmers in the interior are very conservative and cling with an almost childish devotion to the tools and implements used by their fathers and great-grandfathers from the days of Abraham. Even such conservatism, however, is giving way, especially when the greater usefulness of Western methods is demonstrated. For instance, the rich plains of Gaza are now being cultivated by means of an English twelve-furrow gang-plow of seventy horse-power, which was imported by the Orient Commerce Company, and for the cost of which the natives subscribed every penny. The good results of this Western plow have induced the new governor of Jerusalem to order five more implements for work upon the plain of Sharon, the plain of Esdraelon, the plain of Rephaim and the Jordan Valley. A steam road-roller for the streets of Jerusalem has also been ordered.

At the same time the irrigation of the valley of the Jordan is being seriously considered by a new company, which has recently been formed for the purpose. Jerusalem depends at present entirely on rain for its water supply. Towards the end of the summer, when most cisterns have become empty, water is generally injurious and unsanitary, and is sold by the sheepskin at high prices. It often causes fevers and hundreds of deaths. A committee has been appointed to consider a plan which a German firm has submitted to its notice.

The water will be pumped from 'Ain Farah, a spring about two hours' walk to the northeast of Jerusalem, passing by the village of Anathoth. 'Ain Farah, which means the "eye of the mouse," is the source of the famous Brook Cherith, where the Prophet Elijah was fed by the ravens.

The working of the plan, according to the official report, will be as follows:

"The German firm will put in a plant to pump the 'Ain Farah water into Jerusalem at its own expense, piping the water into each house, and charging for the same 1.25 francs (one franc equals 19.3 cents) per cubic metre, or to any one paying in advance 1,500 francs an agreement would be made to give one cubic metre per day for thirty years. Also seventy-five cubic metres of water will be allowed the municipality free for drinking fountains and street sprinkling, any further amount required by the municipality to be supplied at half price. At the end of thirty years the complete water works are to be handed over to the municipality."

In this agricultural development the Zionist movement has found an outlet. Hitherto Jewish immigrants settled in five or six large towns where they took up light trades such as tinkering, tailoring, carpentering and shoe-making. A few colonies were established in the plain of Sharon and along the coast near Mount Carmel, but they did little at first. More land has, however, been bought up in Palestine by Zionist agents during the last two years than during the twenty previous. A large part of the Ghor (Jordan Valley) is now Jewish property, and the Holy City itself is owned mainly by Jewish landlords. Of the one hundred thousand inhabitants of Jerusalem, more than half are Jews; the same proportion applies to Jaffa (Joppa), Tiberias and Safed. Whereas formerly Jewish immigrants were not allowed residence in the country, now they are welcomed with open arms. In the recent mayoral elections at Jerusalem out of the five candidates for the office two were Jews. The writer received a communication only last week in which he is informed that a strong Zionist banking and agricultural agency has taken up its quarters in the central part of the city, and is pushing forward the cause of Zionism and the Jews with an indomitable energy. Indeed, so actively is this buying process carried on that native local journals regularly appear with large-type warnings against this Israelitish occupation, which, they declare, must end in the total swallowing up of the native farmer. "This struggle for mastery," they plead, "is unequal and unfair. The Jew is equipped with every modern

A Great Enterprise

WITH the opening of the gigantic railway terminal, and of the new East River tunnels, and their connecting network of subways, on September 8, New York City has reached out to suburban territory which must ultimately make it the largest and most populous city in the world. It has been a herculean work, this tunneling of the Hudson and East Rivers, together with the tunnels across Manhattan Island and the converging mass of subterranean lines under the great terminal building itself. It has taken eight years of most difficult and hazardous engineering to construct these tunnels. Now that they are completed and thrown open to the public, one may almost feel justified in forecasting the day when the extensive territory that has now been brought within the immediate domain of the metropolis will give us a population in excess even of that of London, where the area of future development is restricted by natural conditions. Another decade may bring about this wonderful result.

It is due primarily to the genius of men like Cassatt and McAdoo that such vast projects are evolved and carried through successfully. In a very high sense, they have been public benefactors, for they are even now solving for us the overshadowing problem of metropolitan congestion. We may look forward to the early realization of the long cherished dream of attractive homes for the industrial classes within easy reach of their work; for better, more healthful and happier surroundings for the countless multitudes who have been penned up in the crowded city in unsanitary dwellings. Long Island is the natural outlet for the city's crowded multitudes. It has been for years their summer playground; a delightful holiday territory; now it will be devoted to the creation of tens of thousands of homes, easy of access and with natural attractions and surroundings that are impossible in the city. It is this pleasing outlook that makes the completion of the tunnel the greatest event in the history of American home-founding. We believe that the $112,000,000 expended on the tunnel and the great terminal have been well invested and will be repaid an hundred fold in increased health, happiness and prosperity.

The Peace Commission

QUIETLY and with steps that are invisible to the common eye, Peace is making progress. It was a great step forward when the United States Senate lately adopted the House joint resolution, providing for the appointment of a commission of five representative Americans to work for the interest of world-peace. That resolution defines the scope of the labors of the commission. It is to consider the best methods of bringing about the limitation of armaments by international agreement, and also the best ways of lessening the wasteful and oppressive war budgets of the world. Of course, our Peace Commissioners will encounter many obstacles in carrying forward this enterprise. Four great European Powers are at this moment in the heyday of annual spectacular military display. At least two of these powers have armies in the field, on the sea, and to some extent in the air and under the sea, while the others chiefly excel in the strength of their military equipment on land. If we look eastward, we find China training an army that will eventually aggregate many millions of fighting men as well armed as any European force. Japan, too, shows the dominant military spirit, notwithstanding her poverty; while Russia, whether as a European or an Asiatic power, is striving to regain her old-time prestige. What chance will our Peace envoys have with the chancellors of those countries which, however their rulers may talk of peace, are continually preparing for war? Our mission must be one of education. Our commissioners must make intellectual, social and moral propaganda, rather than political. It is still a long look forward to the "federation of the world"—to that day when the combined navies will be the peace guards of the seas, and when the Hague Court will be the high peace tribunal of all nations. But that day will come; it is our duty to work for it, to look and to hope and pray for it, and, above all else, to inculcate the love of peace in the hearts of our children. They should be taught the barbarous nature of war and that the very worst use to which human beings can be put is to put them up as targets for bullets or chopping blocks for the sword.

The Personal Touch

HUMAN philosophy falls so far short of explaining divine things that it is folly to apply it. Better trust God and let him enlighten us in his own way, by doing his perfect work in ourselves. What we need and should hope for most of all is the personal touch with the divine. Just as we greatly desire to meet and know some one whom we have already learned to love through hearing others tell of him, so we long in our inmost heart for that personal touch with the divine which will kindle our soul into flame, energize our bodies and spiritualize our whole lives. How is this to be had—this soul contact which means so much to the sincere Christian? We do not need to look far for the explanation, for it is furnished by the Master himself. "If any man love me . . . and I will come and abide with him." This then is the personal touch—to do his will, to preach his Gospel to those that sit in darkness, to feed his poor, to comfort his sorrowing ones, to clothe his naked, to lighten the burden of the oppressed, to minister to his sick. These are the loving tasks he lays upon his faithful followers. Such labors are in themselves both praise and prayer. They constitute the high service. They are the practical manifestation of his love working in us and through us. When we are enlisted under the banner of Christ we cease to think of ourselves; we know we are his and that is enough. And so we keep in touch with him, our Lord and Master, working with a glowing, delighted zeal such as no other service can ever yield.

The Real Preacher

OUR contemporary, the Interior, of Chicago, has pretty clear views on the value of sermonic effort. "Is preaching a performance?" it asks. That is to say: Should the pastor preach for admiration's sake and for appreciation purely, or should he preach from the heart, no matter how his hearers regard his effort? We have known of many ministers who sincerely believe that the preparation of their Sunday sermon is in the nature of a high literary function, and that each sentence and paragraph must be perfectly balanced and adjusted with due regard to logical and rhetorical form. We have known others who, with equal care in preparation, strove to search among their own heart-strings for a message that would awaken a response in their hearers, as a poet or story-writer might lash his own emotions into action so that he might give a more vivid picture of them to others. Again, we have known preachers who delighted to dazzle their hearers with philosophy or with evidence of deep and high culture, quoting from famous authors and introducing what some call "literary embroidery" lavishly into their discourse, like the insertion of fine laces in a lady's sleeve. All of these, admirable as they may be in themselves, are apart from the real mission of the preacher. First, he must have in his heart not only the grace of God and his truth, but he must be willing to be, not the player, but the instrument; he must let the divine message come out spontaneously, unhindered by any personal considerations. Vanity is the last thing that will enter the mind of the real preacher—the man who is consumed by the passion for winning souls. He is fearless because he has the strength and power of Omnipotence behind him, and the earnestness and truthfulness and simplicity of his message commends itself to thirsty souls in a way that cannot be bettered by adventitious aids. Sermons are too often eloquent and little else; lacking the essential point of clear, earnest, straightforward Gospel presentation, they miss their mark altogether.

The Great Fisheries Dispute Settled

FOR nearly three generations, ever since the treaty of 1818, in fact, there has been constant friction between the United States and Great Britain over the question of the so-called Newfoundland fisheries. Now the questions at issue have been passed upon and settled by the International Tribunal at the Hague, and both American and British fishermen will feel a sense of relief that the long dispute is at an end and that each side knows exactly what its rights and privileges are in the famous fishing grounds from which not only a good part of America, but Europe also, draws the larger portion of their finny food supply.

There were seven points at issue, and the decisions favored the United States in five of them and Great Britain in two. The two decisions for Great Britain, however, are of such great importance that it may be fairly stated that this long-drawn contest in diplomacy has been settled in her favor. Point five, on the question of the three-mile limit between Cape Ray and the Rameau Islands, was the one which Great Britain declared to be the main issue. The Americans were forbidden by treaty to fish inside the "three-mile limit" between these two points. Great Britain contended that it was three miles outside of a line drawn from headland to headland, that the bays were closed to them, and that the line did not follow the indentations of the coast. By the treaty of 1818 our fishermen were not to take fish inside the three-mile limit of any coast, bays or harbors. The dispute was on the meaning of the word "bay" alone. Senator Root contended that it should not be construed so as to include the great inward curves on the coasts of Cape Breton, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and Nova Scotia, and that the measures should be from shore line.

Question One, which allows American owners to hire non-Americans to fish for them on their ships, was an important point settled in favor of the United States. Question Six was of great importance to American fishermen. By treaty the people of the United States were allowed to take fish from certain bays, harbors and creeks on the southern, western and northern coasts of Newfoundland. Here Great Britain claimed that the line should be taken from headland to headland. The contention was not sustained, as any nationality could fish outside such a limit. Newfoundland never claimed it was wrong until 1905, and the old interpretation of the treaty in this case holds.

American fishermen also can go ashore for the purpose of procuring wood and water, but not for the purpose of curing fish. It is also decided they should not pay dues for lighthouses. The tribunal decided that British fishermen should have especial advantages in the fishery regulation over Americans, provided such were not manifestly unfair. A special committee was appointed to consider these regulations.

A Division of New York's Labor Parade Ready to March

A Group of Women Workers in the Parade

New York's Labor Parade

ON September 5 there was the greatest Labor Day parade that New York City had ever seen. An army of men and women thirty-five housand strong marched joyfully down Fifth Avenue, from the Park at Fifty-ninth Street to the Washington Arch. The parade was under the direction of Chief Inspector Max F. Schmittberger, who led the line in an automobile. He conducted a squad of mounted policemen, who formed a vanguard of the procession. Edward B. Hannah, the grand marshal, and his aides reviewed the paraders at Washington Square. It took between three and four hours for the pageant to pass a given point, and fifty thousand people from the pavements viewed the marching throng. As in former years, the housesmiths, three thousand strong, wore red and blue shirts and white felt hats and formed the first division; next came the members of the Tunnel and Subway Constructors' Union, the men who burrow under the surface and make rapid transit possible. There were fifteen hundred of them in gray shirts and felt hats, carrying little American flags. A wagon draped with bunting bore this appeal: "Help the striking bakers." At the head of a division of twelve hundred machinists was a blue banner which read: "We are for the universal eight-hour day." One thousand metal polishers were in line, and a hundred and fifty pipe-caulkers wore khaki uniforms. Plumbers, members of the Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, cigarmakers, actors, barbers, cloak-cutters, and representatives of every conceivable class of organized industry went to make up the mighty tide that marched by. This year's parade had some peculiar features. It was a triumphal march for the thousands of cloakmakers, whose long-drawn-out strike had just been successfully terminated. More than ten thousand of them marched happily down the avenue, with their banners, happy faces and songs. Nearly five thousand women and girls formed a division of the Cloakmakers' Union in the march. They were dressed in gay colors, and some wore wreaths of flowers on their heads. They sang and cheered as they marched, unmindful of the sweltering heat, with the mercury standing at about ninety in the shade, and unwearied with the long march, from the beginning of Central Park to Washington Square. The women were lustily cheered all along the line. Fortunately the cloakmakers' strike ended without violence, and it is understood that questions of dispute are hereafter to be much more swiftly settled by arbitration. Soldiers have marched down the streets of the metropolis, with new uniforms and bright muskets, out to the field of battle and then back again and over the same streets with depleted ranks and widespread lamentation. It is to be hoped that such processions as marched down the avenue on Labor Day in the interest of peace and prosperity, will represent the processions that shall march through the streets of all of our cities, conquering want, misery and vice, building up home, country and the kingdom of God. These processions suggest the march the prophet saw:

And they shall march every one on his ways, and they shall not break their ranks: neither shall one thrust another; they shall walk every one in his path. (Joel 2:7, 8.)

Pure Radium Discovered

Mme. Sklodowska Curie, chief professor in the faculty of sciences in the Paris University, who with her husband is credited with the discovery of radium, has just announced to the Paris Academy of Sciences that she has succeeded in obtaining pure radium. Hitherto radium had only existed in the form of salts. Mme. Curie, in conjunction with Professor De Bierne, treated a decigramme of bromide of radium by an electrolytic process, obtaining an amalgam from which was extracted the metallic radium by distillation. It has the appearance of a white metal, and is capable of adhering strongly to iron. It turns to black on exposure to air, burns paper and oxidizes in water. God has stored away the richest treasures in the earth for human investigation and use. Job graphically describes the hiding away of these precious treasures in the earth.

Surely there is a vein for the silver, and a place for gold where they fine it. Iron is taken out of the earth, and brass is molten out of the stone. . . . As for the earth, out of it cometh bread; and under it is turned up as it were fire. The stones of it are the place of sapphires: and it hath dust of gold. (Job 28:1, 2, 5, 6.)

Golden Sands

By a telegram from Winnipeg it is learned that a new gold field of surprising value has been discovered within twenty-five miles of a railroad. Hundreds are flocking to the place from all parts of the United States and Canada. The place of discovery, the Pas Keewatin ground, lies only thirty miles north of the junction of the Pas Mission line and six miles east. It seems that two hunters out after game stopped at an old shack for a camp. They put up a small stove which had no legs, and fearing that the bottom would burn the floor, one of the men brought a pail of sand and put it in under the stove. The other hunter noticed something strange about the sand, examined it critically, and finding a long ridge of the same kind of sand he sent samples away to be assayed. The first indicated $30 to the ton, the second $40, and the third $50. When the result of the third sample became known, there was a great rush of people from Prince Albert and all points along the line. The people in that country are crazy with the gold fever. God has hidden the precious metals away in the earth for the use of men. In all ages gold has been counted precious as a decoration, a treasure and a circulating medium of trade. The sailors of Hiram and the servants of Solomon were sent to places where gold had been discovered to bring back the precious treasure.

And they came to Ophir, and fetched from thence gold, four hundred and twenty talents, and brought it to King Solomon. (I. Kings 9:28.)

Church of Happiness

The newest place of worship in Washington, to be erected in a few weeks by a group of preachers and evangelists, will be known as the "Church of Happiness." The incorporation papers indicate that the new church will be built for music, merriment and laughter. "The old hell of the old religion, with its flaming fires, its dancing imps in leather hides and hoofs, its catacombs of bones and dead hopes, its fumes of sulphur, is a thing of the past," the papers state. "It was an idea adroitly employed to frighten people into the church." The new religion recognizes that crime is hatched where there is no mirth, depravity flourishes in the shades of darkness. Music and merriment will be the important elements of the church of the future. Mr. Theodore Valliant, an evangelist, has been two years working at the scheme, and it is said that a number of influential and wealthy people are engaged in the new enterprise. Members of the Personal Liberty League are also actively supporting it. The projectors insist that there shall be no blue laws in their new institution. This so-called new religion sounds like a parody, seems like a huge joke. Merriment and laughter have their places in the world and are amongst the fruits of a genuine Christianity, but they have no power to remove sin from the human heart, and are a mockery as a foundation of a "church of happiness." There does not seem to be a word in the new creed about Christ or the atonement or penitence or faith or forgiveness. The chief doctrine of the new religion seems to be to laugh all sin out of court, and to be good by being funny. The true religion, the one that is old and yet ever new, is founded upon Jesus Christ and upon his cross.

For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. (I. Cor. 3:11.)

Whale Clears Mystery

In the spring of 1903, the little whaling vessel James T. Duncan sailed from Halifax with a crew of seven men, and from that day to this has never been heard from. Not long ago the German ship Pallanza from Hamburg struck an enormous whale. The monster was impaled on the prow of the ship and died after a terrific struggle. Nine sailors were set to work to cut away the carcass, and one discovered a harpoon embedded in the whale. On it was carved "J. T. D. [for James T. Duncan], 1902." This leads the captain of the Pallanza to realize that the mystery of the disappearance of the little whaling vessel seven years ago has been explained. It is evident that the little crew came across the whale, wounding it with the harpoon, but finally being sunk by a blow from the monstrous creature's tail. Oblivion seems the law over the past, and yet there is here and there a disposition of earth and air and sea to give up secrets long kept to themselves. There is a great day of settlement in the future toward which we are all moving, when every mystery will be explained and every secret revealed. A desire to meet the accounts of that day is not the highest motive to action, and yet it is considered of importance in the divine dispensation, as we are reminded by the words:

For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil. (Eccles. 12:14.)

Ministry of Affliction

The dastardly attempt to murder Mayor Gaynor of New York filled the civilized world with indignation. His return to health is the cause of universal rejoicing and congratulation. The spirit of patience and forgiveness which he has manifested in his terrible affliction has preached eloquent sermons to his fellow countrymen. When he was at the hospital his son reported that his father said if he should recover he should never make any charge against his assailant. In conversation he will not allow any mention to be made of the one who assaulted him, the circumstances of the tragedy or anything of the kind. He says he wants everything unpleasant dismissed from memory and discussion. The other day he made this remark, which is beautiful and glorious in the extreme: "I am content. My great hope is that the event will help to make me a better man and more patient and just." Whatever may be the fate or future of Mayor Gaynor, these philosophic and Christian sentiments will have right to a permanent place in the thought and affection of the people of this country. There is no power in afflictions to regenerate the heart, but under the divine blessing they often beautify and purify the spirit. It requires a high state of patience and grace to appreciate this fact.

For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal. (II. Cor. 4:17, 18.)

The Automobile in Small Towns

A Popular Type of Motor Truck Which Carries Milk and Produce from Village to City or to the Railroad

WHEN the Gaekwar of Baroda visited Chicago, during his recent American tour, his Indian Highness was especially impressed with the number and variety of the motor cars in the streets of the big Western city. He had ridden in autos in his own country; he had tried the French machines with satisfaction and had motored a bit up and down through England; but the American high-class machine fascinated him as no others had done. To a favored attendant, he told his desire to possess one of the best types of American motor cars, and ingenuously asked which he considered the best. The question was a poser, for the person asked knew little about automobiles. He had a happy thought, however. "Highness," said he, "let me send some of these wonderful machines here for your personal inspection; then you will be able to judge when you see them together." The Gaekwar smiled his assent, and next day a wonderful procession of autos parked up before the front of his hotel. Each was of a different make and each had a clever Chicago demonstrator who, in turn, imparted to the Prince with great volubility all he could possibly wish to know about the superior qualities of the different machines. "But," said the Gaekwar, turning to his associate, "which is the best? If I am to believe these men, they are all best."

"Um," replied the other, "that is, they are all so good that your Highness——"

"I can't decide," said the Gaekwar smiling, "but they are all so beautiful that I think I will make no mistake if I shall take them all home with me, eh?"

"Excellent, your Highness," was the reply. The Gaekwar nodded, waved his hand in token of command and the machines were purchased forthwith. There were some sixteen of them, so says the report, and when they reach Baroda, which is one of the richest and most fashionable principalities in India, the five million subjects of the Prince will see such a procession of American autos as no other Oriental prince or potentate can boast.

But every would-be autoist is not so fortunately situated as to be able to buy machines that run up into the thousands of dollars. The popular machine for the average American buyer is one that will give equally good service, though he will not pay probably more than twelve to eighteen hundred dollars for it. Indeed, there are many good machines below that figure.

So rapid is the growth of the automobile industry that it is impossible to put an exact estimate on the valuation of the capital invested, but a conservative estimate places it at $500,000,000. In this vast total not less than half represents moderate and low-priced machines, whose enormous sales—a ratio of six to one—are not trumpeted like those of the high-priced autos. About 200,000 persons are employed in the manufacture of automobiles and accessories. Between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000 is paid for freight to the railroads by the automobile companies annually. The annual consumption of steel, iron, aluminum and rubber is valued at over $60,000,000.

Automobile manufacturers affirm that the auto has dispensed with the services of 500,000 horses and wagons up to date. They also give the broad general estimate that the average upkeep of a horse and wagon is sixty-five cents a day, while that of the average motor car is only thirty cents per day.

There is no limit to the commercial possibilities of the automobile. The world is looking for time, money and labor-saving devices. Nothing in the last decade has done so much to educate the masses in mechanical arts as has the automobile. It is impossible now to find any one who can make such gross blunders as were perpetrated only a few years ago in many of the newspaper reports. Both in city and country it has done more to solve the transportation problem than any other invention in many years. It has added many working hours to the business man's day and has been a source of happiness and enjoyment to his family. While the rich were the first to reap its benefits, it is now by no means limited to them. It has become the servant of the masses. Civilization is changing and the automobile is now bringing the outlying districts into close touch with the business centres.

Now that its advantages are becoming generally known and that the claims for it are being made good, the automobile is no longer regarded as a mere pleasure vehicle for the rich. Small dealers, grocers, butchers, bakers, farmers and business men are beginning to realize that it is a business necessity. They have found out that one auto delivery wagon will do the work of two horse-drawn vehicles and at far less expense. It also saves the wages of the extra man and gives prestige—an air of prosperity—to the business, which is worth dollars to the merchant.

A Light Delivery Wagon Which Connects the Merch in Small Towns with Country Customers thrown in. Dealers have stored in Kansas Ci about 5,000 automobiles which they expect to sell the farmers of the South and Southwest, as soon the latter have disposed of their crops and plac their money in the banks. This is said to represe a scanty sixty per cent. of the cars that are a nually sold in that section. Kansas now ow $12,000,000 worth of autos, an evidence of agric tural thrift and sound prosperity.

An Outlet for Congested New York

A New Tunnel System Connects Fifty Towns with the Metropolis

Crowds at Jamaica, Long Island, Listening to Speeches

Crowds at a Railway Station Watching the First Train Come in

NEW YORK CITY, which is rapidly approaching the dignity of being the largest metropolis in the world, on Thursday, September 8, celebrated another very important addition to its suburban transportation facilities. This was the opening of the new Pennsylvania Tunnels, connecting Manhattan with practically all the important points on Long Island by underground train service. The new system extends from the heart of the city to the centre of Long Island, and includes over fifty towns and villages, which are now for the first time brought into close connection with the great metropolis.

There was consequently great rejoicing among a very large portion of the population of the towns and villages on Long Island, and in the city also, at the opening of the big Seventh Avenue Terminal. A train, carrying the officers of the company and many distinguished people who had been invited to share in the opening ceremonies, started from the Seventh Avenue Terminal at 9.33 A.M. and the first passenger train left the same station at 3.41 P.M. carrying a happy crowd of commuters. The running schedule, which went into operation at once, calls for six hundred trains a day, passing back and forth through the tubes, under the East and Hudson Rivers. As the trains went out in rapid succession, they were welcomed by delegations in many of the villages.

These tunnels will be of the greatest assistance in solving the congestion and transportation problems. As an illustration of how time is saved by the opening of the new tunnels, it may be stated that on the main line on Long Island, the old running time to many points is cut down more than one-half, and to all points, from one-third to one-half. Thus, the old time from New York to Jamaica, which was 44 minutes, is now cut down to 19 minutes, and to points on the main line in proportion. On the Montauk division, the time to Valley Stream, 61 minutes, is reduced to 35 minutes; Freeport, 77 minutes to 51 minutes; Babylon, 85 minutes to 60 minutes. On the Long Beach branch, the time to East Rockaway is reduced from 68 minutes to 36 minutes. On the other branches the time to Arverne, 53 minutes to 20 minutes; Far Rockaway, 60 minutes, to 37 minutes; Huntington, 74 minutes, to 57 minutes; Woodside, 31 minutes, to 9 minutes; College Point, 50 minutes, to 27 minutes; Flushing, 39 minutes, to 18 minutes.

The opening of the tunnels marks a new era for millions who will inevitably seek homes outside of the congested metropolitan districts along the lines of the tunnels. At a luncheon given to the tunnel officials and a number of invited guests by the jubilant people of Jamaica, L. I., the Hon. Timothy Woodruff said that the entire island was thrilled with the magic of the new departure. It was an event that concerned the city, the State and the nation. Within a few years, the boroughs of Kings and Queens will have miles upon miles of sheltered dockage for deep-sea tonnage, nearer by many miles to ocean steamship travel, and served by the greatest railroad system in the world. He said: "It takes no stretch of the imagination to see not many years hence the great level track stretching south from Long Island Railroad at Jamaica, built up with factories and warehouses, fringed beyond by miles of docks where vessels will be seen flying the flags of all the nations of the world, while all along to the northward of the railroad the beautiful wooded hills, whose rolling character insures their protection against the inroads of commerce, will be dotted everywhere with the homes of those who are sharing in the community's prosperity."

Credit for the devising and carrying out of this great transportation scheme which has now reached a successful issue, belongs largely to the courage and foresight of the late A. J. Cassatt, one of the greatest railroad builders of this age. It also belongs to Wm. H. Baldwin, former President of the Long Island Railroad, and to Charles W. Raymond, Charles M. Jacobs, and Alfred Noble, engineers of the tunnels, and those who were associated with them in carrying out Mr. Cassatt's plans. Manhattan has long been overcrowded and every year has made matters worse. Long Island furnished the most natural outlet for the congestion, and now that relief has come, it will be interesting and instructive to note the rapid spread of population along the comparatively narrow strip of territory which has already seen such a wonderful development during the last twenty years. Now that the island has fairly been joined to the metropolis by bridges and tunnels, it promises soon to become densely populous, and we may expect to see new cities and villages arise at many points which are now farms or gardens.

With the opening of the new Pennsylvania Railroad station, New York comes into possession of the largest and finest railroad depot in the world, not in size only, but in all its appointments and its architectural beauty. The terminal is 788 feet and 9 inches long, and 430 feet and 6 inches wide. It covers two entire city blocks, bounded by Seventh and Eighth Avenues and Thirty-first and Thirty-third Streets. Beneath this imposing pile of Italian stone, granite and concrete, is the intricate system of tunnels, through which millions of travelers must pass daily, going through and from the city, from all parts of the country.

A few statistics concerning the newly-completed tunnel system are given below: $111,000,000 was paid out for material and work during the eight years of construction. The land purchased cost $18,000,000. The great terminal is in the geographical centre of Manhattan Borough. It is the largest railroad station in the world. The entire tunnel system now includes two or double sets of tunnels, twin tubes under the North River, connecting Manhattan with New Jersey; one set of twin tubes connecting New York and Brooklyn, and four tunnels under the East River to Long Island City, connecting there with the new subways, which reach out in various directions across the island. Still further extensions are projected, which will take in more suburban territory. One of the features is the great railroad yard at Sunnyside, Long Island City, which is the centre from which the tunnel system radiates eastward. It is estimated that not less than 100,000,000 passengers a year will go through the great New York terminal, arriving or departing by the various tunnels and subways. The time-saving for such a vast body of travelers under the new system will be enormous, when we reckon the average daily travel of the suburban commuter. During the first few hours of travel in the new tunnels, thirty-five thousand passengers used the tubes and subways across the East River. In that time, 99 trains were run from the terminal to different points on Long Island.

Current Topics

—A TRAIN recently made the trip from Camden to Atlantic City, N. J., at the rate of ninety miles an hour, establishing a new record in railroading. There are no doubt men still living who can recall the time when public opinion in the newspapers and elsewhere united in declaring that people would be liable to asphyxiation if they were carried in cars at a higher rate than twenty-five miles an hour.

—COLORADO HAS its Cincinnatus in Roady Kenehan, an honest blacksmith, who was called from the forge to take up the duties of State auditor. He is the sworn foe of graft in every shape, and knows no party distinctions where official fraud is concerned. The blacksmith has proved a Tartar to the professional politicians. He has detected a number of frauds, big and petty, and has compelled restitution or punishment, or both.

Rome's New Fight for Freedom

By ITALIA GARIBALDI

Granddaughter of General Garibaldi, "Liberator of Italy"

THE wars of Italian independence broke not only the sway of petty tyranny and political dominion of the Papacy, but also opened the doors to new religious lights, which the people—free at last to have a mind and a will of their own—openly discussed and sometimes adopted.

As a consequence of the liberal laws given by the new government, the different Protestant denominations have had the opportunity of widening the breach between ignorance and fanaticism, and simple pure Christianity within the very heart of Catholicism.

Protestant churches have met with varied success. In Rome itself they all have a standing, but none so strongly planted as the "fighting Methodists," as they are called for the great energy and activity displayed in getting near to the people's hearts and winning them for Christ.

The large, beautiful building they own, with its Italian and English churches, the Sunday School rooms, the various apartments for the presiding elder and the pastor, the gymnasium for the boys, the printing house, the newspaper, the boy's college, constitutes the stronghold of Methodism in Rome.

But that is not all. Across the yellow Tiber and in view of the Vatican, the Girls' Home School of the W. F. M. S. stands as another beacon of the work which is being done by the Methodists.

Seventy girls are there, being taught God's word, and preparing to carry it to other Italians. In the first years they were only the children of the poorest class. Now doctors, lawyers, professional men of all kinds ask incessantly to have their girls educated under Methodist guidance. This is the sign of the times and of the foothold Methodists are taking, and even lately one of the girls was chosen over three thousand others to say a speech of thanks to the mayor of Rome. Such is the consideration in which the school is held.

On the other side of the city, Crandon Hall gathers the best of the land, and the daughters of the most important families of Rome and of other cities. That is Methodist work again, and the Sunday Schools opened in the poorest quarters, the kindergarten, the evangelizing done by the students of the theological school, all speak of an organization widely spreading in its influence.

Signorina Italia Garibaldi

Activity, enthusiasm, consecration, make of the fighting Methodists an indisputable power, which, though not openly acknowledged, events have shown to be carefully and keenly watched and to have no indifferent weight in the turn of the Vatican's diplomacy.

That such a state of things has been brought about in a country which for many centuries has known the sway of only one form of religion, and where at present indifference and skepticism prevail, is certainly encouraging, both to those who have planned and prayed for the work's success, and for those who are the workers.

[Miss Italia Garibaldi, granddaughter of the great liberator of Italy, arrived recently in New York and will spend some time in this country speaking in the interests of her school, and lecturing on the life and career of Garibaldi. She is a young woman of pleasing personality and versatile gifts. Speaking English fluently, and working with energy and persistency, she is well adapted to present the needs of her immediate work in an intelligent and interesting manner. She was the first girl to enter Crandon Hall in Rome, and afterward graduated from the Normal School; she has studied at the Baltimore Woman's College, and this summer received a degree in English at the University in Rome.

Her father, General Ricciotti Garibaldi, is the only surviving son of the patriot, and himself a soldier of renown. Her mother was Miss Constance Hopcraft of London, a woman of wide humanitarian interests; she maintains a small hospital for the poor in the former home of Garibaldi, in the island of Caprera, northwest of the island of Sardinia; is actively interested in the S. P. C. A., and is a Red Cross nurse.]

IN THE HOME QUEEN'S REALM

Present-Day Reading Matter

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"MOTHER and I have often spoken of the good old habit of reading aloud, and we have said: 'What would happen if a young man and a young woman should attempt to read a magazine story of the period together? Could they do it many times without running across something that would bring a blush?' What is the matter with modern short stories? I don't mean THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stories, of course. They are clean and pure. But many of the standard magazines are now printing numbers that it seems to me can do no one any good to read. They are full of details unsuitable for general conversation. Isn't there something that our story writers can put before us, with a pleasanter taste in the mouth? How few stories can be read in a mixed circle nowadays! R. S. N."

Every one who reads the current fiction of the period must have noticed that much of it has for its motive problems that concern the relations of the sexes, and other themes that were formerly avoided in ordinary conversation. Reading the works of Dickens and Thackeray, of William Black and Mrs. Oliphant, we find that they concerned themselves with love as a pure influence, and that when they spoke of illicit love and its consequences, they did so with a delicacy in sharp contrast to the brutality of present-day writers. Many thoughtful persons are beginning to ask the question put by our correspondent. The literature of fiction is not intended merely for the young, but when one can scarcely open a book or magazine and with safety read it in the family circle, it is time that there should be a protest from the public.

Why Young Men Shun the Ministry "The colleges and theological schools will soon begin their work for another year. As one who has given much attention to the subject, I wish to interest the Christian home in an important theme. No one can be blind to the fact that our gifted young men are not rushing into the ministry. The brilliant students in the universities are going into civil engineering, chemistry, law, medicine, indeed, into almost any profession rather than that of preaching the Gospel. Parents do not now dedicate their sons to this noble work. One reason probably is that the ministerial profession is poorly paid, and that a man after spending the best years of his life in working for a stipend, scanty enough in the beginning, never gets ahead, and if he live to old age may be a charge upon the church. The average minister cannot hope to save anything, and he may reach the dead line when he is still in his prime, physically and mentally. The churches clamor for young men and discount men of fifty. The young men who are ambitious and talented try to find Christian work outside the pulpit. JOHN B. W."

Our friend's letter touches a vital question. What have the Christian women who read this page to say about it? Is there not at least a danger that we have less spirituality in our every-day religion than we ought to have, if we loved the Master loyally? In other words, is there a decline of faith? How far are the pews responsible for the lack of candidates for the pulpit?

How to Be Beautiful In what does beauty consist? How are we to define its charm? Is it dependent on the complexion, the eyes, the hair, or the shape of the features? We understand very well that a girl may be beautiful with irregular features and a sallow complexion, although an artist might contradict the assertion. Expression and individuality have as much to do with beauty as the externals of the face, and a girl or woman who is amiable and pleasing may put in her claim to be beautiful, when another whose countenance is marred by discontent will be considered positively plain.

The truth is that beauty is much more a thing of the soul than of the house the soul lives in. A woman who begins life with the apparent misfortune of what is called homeliness may, if she live long enough, achieve the distinction of beauty. Clear eyes, a good skin and fairly abundant hair are within the reach of all persons who understand the art of preserving health. This art includes sleeping and resting, taking exercise, living in the fresh air, and day by day doing one's duty as faithfully as one can in the place of the Lord's choosing.

The Wonderful "Sausage Tree"

THE "Sausage Tree," so named obviously because of the resemblance of its fruit to the well-known sausage, is common to many parts of the tropical world. This tree is found in Java, Ceylon, and Africa. The fruit is often two feet in length, and from two to three inches in diameter; it shrivels after it falls, and is apparently never eaten, even by the fruit-eating birds and animals of the bush. The distance in this picture is interesting, because it commands a distant view of an arm of the famous Lake Victoria Nyanza.

Mrs. Browning in her poem, "My Kate," gave a beauty recipe in a line. "'Twas her thinking of others made you think of her."

I WOULDN'T BE CROSS, DEAR

I WOULDN'T be cross, dear,
'Tis never worth while.
Disarm the vexation
By wearing a smile.
Whatever annoys you,
Be patient and gay,
For surely good fortune
Is hasting your way.

Women and the Township

IN passing from village to village the spectator has little difficulty in discovering where the women of the place take a hand in municipal affairs, and where the little details that make for order and beauty are exclusively left to the men. The latter are forced by the schedule of the railway and the demands of business hours to be away from their homes six days in the week. Streets littered with papers and unsightly débris, lawns uncut in summer, and snow allowed to remain in heaps on the highway in winter, testify to neglect on the part of the town officials. They are hardly to blame, however, in small places where there are few people who draw salaries from the public funds. Wherever the women of a borough or other community are organized for the purpose of making the town attractive, it ceases to look untidy and assumes a well-groomed aspect. Women bring to bear upon town housekeeping the training of centuries. It is a pity that they cannot induce the State legislatures to prohibit the disfiguring billboards that so often meet the eye as the approach is made to a railway station. They are able on their own account to prohibit objectionable advertisements within their own boundaries, but they cannot exercise a right of domain along railway lines. If they could, we should not see advertisements of trousers, cigars, flour, soap, candles, whisky, rough on rats, liver pills, and other articles flaunted in immense letters and glaring colors just where the landscape is loveliest. Women should organize in "Get-together Clubs," in the interests of beauty, all over the land, so that journeys would be delightful and home environments restful wherever we might turn.

An Excellent Summer Drink Inquiry at any dairy in the city will satisfy the most incredulous person that buttermilk has become a favorite summer drink. In the country it is not valued so highly as in town, although summer boarders often ask for it to the pleased amazement of their hostess. It is refreshing on account of its sub-acid taste, and it contains no little nourishment, as those discover who in hot weather take it for luncheon, sometimes without anything except a slice of brown bread. Buttermilk is excellent for the complexion, removing sunburn, tan and freckles. Those who suffer from poison ivy, with its irritating blisters, should try buttermilk as a remedy. It seldom fails to give quick relief, and in obstinate cases a poultice of bread and buttermilk is almost a certain cure.

To Remove Ink Spots from Linen When little Sarah upsets the ink bottle on her white frock or careless Johnny spatters ink from his pen and leaves a blot on the tablecloth, take the garment at once and remove the spot by the application of lemon juice and salt. A weak solution of oxalic acid will remove ink as if by magic. It must, however, be weak, or the fibre of the cloth will be destroyed. Clear water if used at once will usually remove an ink stain from a colored garment. Ripe tomatoes are said successfully to remove the stains of ink from white muslin. Few housekeepers understand the value of turpentine as a cleansing agent. Added to soap it whitens garments, and by itself if mixed with hot water it will frequently remove ink.

THE COWARD

By KATE UPSON CLARK

THE food was almost intolerable. The water was scarcely better than mud. Although it was only May, the air in southern Louisiana was like a great furnace. Almost every night there was a shower, but it did not cool the hot earth. It merely made everything dank and damp and mouldy.

These conditions did not promote health in the great army of the Southwest, pressing on toward Port Hudson, in the hope of unlocking the Mississippi. The hospitals were full, and many soldiers who would have been called sick at home, were trying to do camp duty. Haynes, of the Eighty-eighth, was one of these. His soul was all right, but his body had suffered from the maggoty pork and the foul water.

"Why don't you report for the hospital, Haynes?" asked Hendricks, of the same company.

"There are plenty of men there now," responded Haynes, briefly.

"Lots of 'em ain't half so sick as you are."

"Maybe not—but I hear the camp is going to be moved. Then, perhaps, we shall all feel better. And if there is going to be a fight I want to be in it."

Luckily, they were soon ordered to march onward to a place only eleven miles from Port Hudson—much better in every way than that which the Eighty-eighth had just left. Great thickets of dewberry bushes, full of ripe fruit, were discovered within half a mile. Those dewberries were food and drink and medicine to many of the exhausted men.

Every day rumors of a coming assault floated in upon the camp. To storm those five miles of strong earthworks at Port Hudson seemed a desperate undertaking, but the men were ready for it. Plainly, the enemy was massing troops in the rear. Possibly an attack might come from that quarter almost any day. The men went around full of suppressed excitement. Something was bound to happen within a week at furthest.

One morning the order came to make fascines. In two days' time a great pile of them lay in a corner of the camp.

On the evening of the second day afterward, they were told to be ready to march at five the next morning. Before they turned in, the fascines were all loaded upon wagons. Then some of the men sat down to write letters—with white faces and heavy-lidded eyes. Those letters might be their last.

All that night, the earth shook with the noise of distant artillery. The soldiers of the Eighty-eighth heard it with sinking hearts. After their long anticipation of a battle, what if it should all be over before they could get there!

Promptly at five they started. That night they encamped within a mile and a half of the great fort.

When the men had had their supper, the colonel went through the camp with his aides to ask who would volunteer for a forlorn hope. One field-officer, four captains, eight lieutenants and two hundred men were desired from each brigade. The Eighty-eighth was to furnish five from each of its companies.

Quietly and rapidly the volunteers came forward. It was asked that they should be unmarried. As each one stepped fearlessly from the ranks, a thrill ran through all who were looking on. The quota was filled in a few minutes.

The order said that half of the forlorn hope were to run from "the woods" (which the Eighty-eighth as yet knew nothing about) and bridge with fascines the ditch in front of the enemy's parapet. This ditch was said to be fifteen feet deep and eleven wide, while the parapet was eight feet high.

The other half were expected to cross on the fascines and assault the enemy at the point of the bayonet.

How far they were to run, they knew not. The fascines, made of branches and twigs, and bound together with grape-vines; were eight feet long, one foot in diameter, and weighed from fifteen to thirty pounds each. Most of them were near the heavier limit.

The wise ones in the camp thought that this was too heavy. If they had all been of the lighter weight or under, they might equally well serve the purpose, and then they could also be carried as shields. As the case stood, they would have to be carried on the shoulder, leaving the vital organs fully exposed.

If the ground to be covered should prove to be rough with fallen trees and with bogs, like some of that over which they had lately marched—and if, as everything indicated, they were to be under fire all the way——

But it was useless to think of that.

The next morning opened with a continuous roar of guns. Shortly after day-break, the men ate breakfast. Then, "Fall in, Eighty-eighth!" "Attention! Forward, march! Guide right!"—and amid the storm of orders the well-drilled men marched a half mile or more, and filed into a cornfield. There they were commanded to halt and ground their arms.

Now they found out where "the woods" were. They were at the west and a trifle ahead of the cornfield. In their shadows the forlorn hope of the Eighty-eighth were ordered together.

In the meantime, Holcomb's Vermont Battery had been advanced to the front and had opened fire. They made one unbroken roar, stirring up fighting blood in the men as not even martial music could do. The ground trembled under it, and the soldiers' clothes shook as if they were in a high wind.

Now and then the cannonading would stop. Then a sound of heavy musketry came from the right. Evidently hot fighting was going on there. How soon would the Eighty-eighth get into it?

"'Take it! it hasn't touched the ground since I took it'"

Suddenly one man cried out, "Our turn comes in fifteen minutes!"

Nobody knew how he could have heard, or whether he really had right information—but over more than one of his hearers crept a mortal, sickly fear — that battle-dread which the bravest sometimes feel on the eve of combat.

It was really true that in just about fifteen minutes, the Eighty-eighth was ordered to advance. In front of them were the fascine-bearers, the storming party following close at their heels.

Soon they were in the thick of the fight. Bullets, grape and canister hurtled through the air. Men began to fall to the right and to the left. Some cried in heart-rending accents, "I am hit!" One, with blood gushing from his neck, moaned, "Boys, I am killed!" —then dropped in a limp heap.

Nobody could stop to help. The dead and wounded had to lie as they fell—many of them to be wounded again by the bursting above them of the terrible shells.

The heavily laden fascine-bearers could not keep up with the storming party, who were constantly obliged to stop, under a galling fire, to wait for the others. A deep ravine was passed—yet still the brave fellows bore their fascines. Then they entered a forest. Many of the trees had been felled by the enemy, and had been laid ingeniously this way and that, most of them on top of others. The spaces between them had been packed with twigs and branches.

The "double-quick," which had been commanded, here became impossible. Even a slow march was impossible. One's foot went down into the deep trap of underbrush. Then it had to be pulled out by main force before another step could be taken.

One by one, the fascine-bearers fell, some from bullets, some from sheer exhaustion, until not a quarter of the original number were left. On every side bleeding men were dropping their bundles and breathing out broken prayers as they tried to drag themselves to the safe side of the terrible felled trees—to die.

Hendricks had been one of the volunteers. Minutes passed. More and more men sank—but he was still pressing on unhurt, when he suddenly discovered that nearly all of his comrades were gone. Counting proved that there were only five others beside himself.

"Six of us can't do this thing. The bridge has got to be given up," they decided.

"Let's get in with some regimen and go to fighting," said Hendricks.

They agreed with him, but none of them except himself had taken the precaution to strap a gun on his back. Fortunately for them, there were plenty of dead and wounded whose guns were free for anybody to take—and soon the brave six were rushing forward into the fray.

Hendricks, being ready equipped, got started first. Where should he fight? Ah, there was the white flag of Massachusetts. It was not that of his own regiment—but no matter. He joined them eagerly. Suddenly, he discovered that beside him was Haynes. He was marching steadily along, but he was doing no firing.

"What's the matter?" asked Hendricks. "Why don't you fire?"

"He's afraid," sneered a cool, hardy stranger near by. "I never saw such a coward in my life. He hasn't fired a round since he came running up fifteen minutes ago. In his scare he has lost his own regiment, and now he is trying to disgrace ours. He wants to run away, I guess—but he is too scared to do even that."

In the meantime, the stranger was firing shot after shot.

Hendricks was thunderstruck. He turned to Haynes for an explanation. The man was as white as marble, but evidently his mind was clear.

"He is quite right," said the poor fellow with chattering teeth. "I've been this way ever since that big fool hollered out, 'Our turn comes in fifteen minutes.' I s'pose it gave me some kind of a shock. I can't even load my gun. I keep trying, but I can't do it. See."

Hendricks' gun was foul and smoking. He stopped under a sheltering rock to clean it. There he could watch Haynes as he tried to load. It was utterly out of his power. His hands shook like leaves in a gale.

"You are sick, man," said Hendricks kindly. "That long course of vile food and drink at camp has got in its work with you. You had better

STONY BROOK'S FIRST CONFERENCE

THE Bible Conference which opened at Stony Brook, L. I., Sunday, August 14, was largely attended. The opening service was held in the new auditorium. Rev. Dr. John F. Carson, director of the Conference, extended a welcome which made every one present feel very much at home. He made a short statement of the things for which the Stony Brook Association stands: The essential and unique deity of Jesus Christ; the integrity of the Word of God; the efficacy of the atoning sacrifice of Christ; the presence and power of the Holy Spirit in the discipleship; the divine institution and agency of the Church of Christ and the broad and binding obligations of the Church to evangelize the world.

The Auditorium Hall at Stony Brook, L. I.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman was the preacher of the morning. "For almost fifteen years," he said, "I was the director of the Winona Bible Conference and saw it grow from an attendance of thirty-five to many thousands. My increasing obligations have made it impossible for me to take this work up again, although it is my expectation to speak at that Conference from time to time."

Dr. Chapman took his text from Prov. 29: 18: "Where there is no vision the people perish." He explained that "vision" here means a recognition of God, of his will and his plans. The word "perish" is literally "runs wild." Where there is no knowledge of God "the people run wild." Where there is no submission to God's will "the people run wild." Where there is no cooperation with God's plans "the people run wild." After speaking of the necessity of this vision of God he called attention to several things that prevent men having the vision. First, a disrespect for Jesus Christ. Second, an irreverent criticism and neglect of the Bible that shuts out the vision. Third, a spirit in the church that shuts out the vision. This means loss of power and the result is empty churches in the midst of teeming populations.

The afternoon meeting was for young people and addresses were made by Mrs. E. M. Whittemore and Richard Tjader of New York. Mr. Tjader has recently returned from Africa. While there he met Colonel Roosevelt and spent several days in his camp. "In my travels I found the missionaries," he said, "doing splendid work. The behavior, however, of certain merchants and travelers is such that it shocks the natives, and causes them to doubt those who are there to do them good; and yet these very men who do such atrocious acts are the ones who condemn the mission workers and come home and write in the magazines. The great power to uplift humanity is the Gospel of Jesus Christ. It is the light for darkest Africa, and must be preached in every section."

Vesper Service was conducted at 6.30 on a knoll overlooking the Sound. The meeting was most spiritual and prepared each one for the evening service in the auditorium, where Dr. David G. Wylie of New York preached from Luke 2: 8.

Mr. Frank Dickson of California had charge of the choir, with Charles H. Marsh of New York, pianist, and Frederick Butler, bass soloist.

Thus ended the first day of the First Bible Conference at Stony Brook. The days all began with the "Morning Watch" at 7.30, held in the Stony Brook Methodist Church, and conducted by William Brattle Oliver, Secretary of the movement. These meetings were the most helpful of the Conference.

The programme that followed was an interesting one. On Monday morning at 9 o'clock Mr. Ralph Norton conducted Conference on personal work or soul-winning. The "Quiet Hour" was conducted by Dr. Chapman. The attendance at that hour was large, people coming in from the towns round about in carriages and automobiles. Dr. John M. Gaston of Pittsburg, Rev. Thomas Needham, Rev. Dr. John H. Kerr of Brooklyn and Rev. Dr. Ford C. Ottman were among the regular Conference speakers. William Phillips Hall, in an address on the "Ministry of the Laity," made some startling statements, reinforced by high authority and his own investigations of religious conditions in the world to-day. He said there are twice as many unevangelized persons in the world to-day as in the time of Christ, and that the increase of the heathen is seventy times greater than that of the converts during the century of missions. It has been discovered that about 56,000,000 people in the United States are out of membership of both the Protestant and Catholic bodies. In other words, two-thirds of the population of our land are not only outside the churches, but outside of Christ. Mr. Hall believes that this great multitude will never be reached by the ordained ministry, so that it is necessary that the work shall be done by a united body of Christians; witnesses made up of all His ministers and people.

John Callahan said: "President Eliot's Theology won't work in the Bowery; we want the strongest there."

Rev. Dr. James M. Farrar (who conducts "The Children's Pulpit" in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD) had charge of the children's services, and it is hard to say who enjoyed these meetings most, the children or the older people.

The many substantial cottages already erected emphasize the permanency of Stony Brook. It will, without doubt, be a popular gathering place for religious workers in conventions, in Bible study, and in the assembling of all great bodies that stand for the uplift of humanity. M. A. MARTIN.

cuddle down here behind this rock until you can steady your nerves."

"No, I won't," persisted Haynes. 'I'm all right. Maybe something will come up that I can do, even if I can't load my gun."

Suddenly, not two rods from them, Haynes's chance came. The iron hail was pounding down on every side, when the bearer of the proud white flag was seen to waver. A river of blood began to gush from his mouth, but, before the banner could fall, Haynes had clutched it. His hands still quivered madly—but, somehow, they held.

Still on the soldiers pressed until they were within forty rods of the parapet. At the very front stood the coward Haynes, paying no more attention to his evidently mortal terror than as if it were a buzzing mosquito.

Then, from behind the advancing brigade, a new fire opened upon them. It was later found that this, through some ghastly blunder, proceeded from one of their own regiments.

A few in the rear saw the trouble and shouted, "Fire higher! Fire higher!" But the officers in front, in the confusion and noise, could not make out the situation. They thought that the enemy had managed to form an ambush. The order to retreat rang over the field, and presently everything was changed.

The most unwilling of all to face about was Haynes. He could not even credit the order until several of his comrades had repeated it to him. Then, reluctantly, and still desperately grasping the flag in his shaking hands, he marched along beside the others, in the orderly retreat. The worst of the firing ceased when the troops turned, but still now and then came a scattering shot.

"Look out!" cried Hendricks quickly. "That's the second ball that has come close to you, Haynes. Some sharpshooter is bound to down that flag."

"He never will down it unless he cuts my arm off," said Haynes doggedly.

On the moment, a third shot came whizzing along—and Haynes staggered backward, with blood flowing from his back and from his arm.

"Take it! Take it!" he shrieked, holding the banner wildly aloft. "It hasn't touched the ground since I took it. Don't let it!"

Hendricks seized the staff. He was none too soon. A shot had entered Haynes's back just below the shoulder-blade and had penetrated his arm, where it had severed the main artery. In less than half an hour he was dead.

In after years, whenever Hendricks was asked to name the bravest man he saw during his three years' service in the Civil War, he always answered, "Haynes—known to some as The Coward."

And then he tells this story.

Chats With Young Folks

A New Hand at the Telephone

A LADY in Englewood, N. J., was called to the telephone one day by the operator, who inquired, "What do you want?"

"Nothing at all," she responded.

"Your bell rang," insisted the operator.

"None of us rang it," replied the lady.

The next day a man appeared from the telephone office.

"I have come to see what makes your telephone bell ring most of the time," he remarked.

But none of the family could enlighten him, and he saw nothing about it which was out of order.

The next day he came again, took the telephone entirely to pieces, examined the full length of the wire. Still, he could find nothing amiss, and still at the central office the little flame kept burning in the niche dedicated to this particular family. This indicated that their bell was ringing.

At last it occurred to the authorities to examine a little box, of about the size of an ordinary suit-case, which was nailed up against a large tree close by the house.

In this box several telephone wires converged. It was a sort of neighborhood switchboard

What was the surprise of the telephone men to find this box nearly filled with nuts! They took out three peach-baskets full, each one holding at least two quarts.

Rioting among the nuts were the youthful members of a promising squirrel family.

The girls in the telephone office had been sure that "spooks" were ringing the mysterious bell which nobody would confess to touching; but, as usually occurs in similar cases, the cause of the trouble was quite natural; the "spooks" were nothing on earth but a family of merry, romping little squirrels.

A Noisy Ghost

NOT long ago, we heard of a terrifying ghost, which proved to be nothing but a rat. Here is a ghost of a different sort.

In one of the magnificent apartment houses on a fashionable street in a great city, dwells a widowed lady of exceptional intelligence. She despises everything that savors of superstition.

One windy autumn night she was awakened from a sound sleep by an explosion like that of a giant firecracker. She was naturally somewhat bewildered, but she was perfectly sure that the noise had been close beside her.

As she sat up in the bed, frightened and trembling, the explosion came again—once, twice, thrice—until she was almost beside herself with terror. There was no flash—no bullets nor fragments of broken bombs flew about the room. It was simply a series of mighty reports, coming from nowhere, leading nowhere, and followed by the most profound silence.

Should she rouse the sleeping family? She had pressed the electric light button, and the room was now brilliantly illuminated. The steam-heat radiator, all the lights, everything seemed as usual. After "going off" six times, the explosions seemed to cease entirely.

The wind blew in raw and chill through an open window not far from her bed. She shivered and decided that she would turn off the lights and try to sleep again.

She was just dozing comfortably off, determined to dismiss from her mind the disquieting noises she had heard, when lo! they began again.

This time there were four—then silence again.

She thought of "the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noonday."

Here was some sort of a tricksy spirit which amused itself with firing off invisible guns in the middle of the night to startle lone women. What could it be?

Again she turned on the lights and searched the room, but, again, she found nothing unusual.

A third series of explosions occurred nearly at daybreak; but for these, the victim of this singular attack did not even sit up in the bed. She was getting used to her ghost.

The next day she sent for the superintendent of the house. He examined all the steam and electric fixtures. Nothing seemed to be out of order. He could hardly credit her story of the terrific explosions. He was too polite to say so, but he plainly believed that she had been dreaming; or was perhaps under the influence of one of these queer modern drugs, which make people see and hear unspeakable things.

She was so incensed at his manner that she was half inclined to move out of the house at once. Thus, at least, she might escape this subtle, ear-splitting, invisible ghost.

For a night or two afterward everything was quiet. None of the rest of the family had heard anything. The walls were thick and the other sleeping rooms were widely separated from the haunted chamber.

On the third night, a high wind was blowing outside, and the explosions began again.

At intervals all night, they kept up. In the morning the desperate victim, who had been gradually coming to the conclusion that possibly there might be ghosts, after all, went to the superintendent and insisted that an expert electrician should be sent for.

While she was waiting for him, she walked about her haunted room, scrutinizing closely every part of it.

Suddenly, in the corner whence, as it had seemed to her, the sounds had proceeded, she noticed that the wall paper was cracked here and there. Could it be possible that the breeze from the open window could strike the wall at such an angle that it would tear open the paper, and in tearing it make a loud report? It did not seem a credible theory.

The expert came and examined all the fixtures. Nothing was amiss.

Then he turned to the wall, and pointed to the tiny cracks in the wall paper.

"Have you heard," he inquired, "that wind sometimes tears open wall paper in such a way as to make a noise like a gun?"

He assured her that it often did, and confirmed the suspicions that she had developed independently just before he appeared.

The ghost had been found.

Probably all the ghost stories of all time could have been explained in a similar way.

Remember that there is always some reasonable and sensible explanation for every strange and uncanny appearance that ever takes place. There is no such thing as a ghost.

ALL THE WAY

By Belle McKinney Swope

LET us be glad.
'Tis such a little while we have to go,
And daylight drops into the evening glow
So rapidly.

Let us rejoice
That these are hours in which to love and sing,
And into hearts a sweeter radiance bring
Because of life.

Let us be glad
That sunset trails are lovelier by far
Than rose-lined pathways of the morning star,
And winding home.

Let us rejoice
That home means heaven and all the glories there;
Our Father's house, his loving tender care,
And perfect peace.

PARKER
LUCKY CURVE
FOUNTAIN PENS

Never will you need wipe ink off the barrel of this pen before you can use it! Never will you soil your fingers or linen when you remove the cap to write—because of the Lucky Curve.

Common fountain pens have straight ink feeds. Ink sticks in straight ink feeds after the pen is returned to your pocket, until air expanded in the reservoir by the heat of the body forces the ink out into the cap, where it soils fingers and linen when you next remove the cap to write. But the Parker's curved ink feed—the Lucky Curve—is self-draining. It clears itself of ink as soon as you stop writing. No ink in the ink feed, none can be forced into the cap—and only the Parker has a self-draining curved ink feed—the Lucky Curve.

SOLD ON TEST TRIAL

Any dealer will let you carry a Parker 10 days before he calls it a sale. If the pen doesn't meet your expectations, he will refund your money.

Children's taste is ofttimes more acc rate in selecting the right kind of food fit the body, than that of adults. Natu works more accurately through the ch dren.

A Brooklyn lady says: "Our little b had long been troubled with weak dige tion. We could never persuade him take more than one taste of any kind cereal food. He was a weak little ch and we were puzzled to know what feed him on.

One lucky day we tried Grape-Nut Well, you never saw a child eat with suc a relish, and it did me good to see hi From that day on it seemed as though v could almost see him grow. He wou eat Grape-Nuts for breakfast and supp and I think he would have liked the foo for dinner.

"The difference in his appearance something wonderful.

"My husband had never fancied cere foods of any kind, but he became ver fond of Grape-Nuts, and has been muc improved in health since using it.

"We are now a healthy family ar naturally believe in Grape-Nuts.

"A friend has two children who we formerly afflicted with rickets. I w satisfied that the disease was caused b lack of proper nourishment. They showe it. So I urged her to use Grape-Nuts an experiment, and the result was almo magical.

"They continued the food, and tod both children are well and strong as ar children in this city, and, of course m friend is a firm believer in Grape-Nu for she has the evidence before her ey every day."

Next to the farmer, the doctor is probably the largest purchaser of automobiles. Thousands of runabouts and light touring cars are sold to the medical profession every season. Every doctor's car replaces from one to four horses and buggies, gives him a wider range for his practice, quicker calls and a proportionately increased income.

If the doctor, why not the minister? There is many a country pastor with a large parish extending many miles in different directions, who might be saved from much needless labor and effort and helped to far more effective work in his field, if he had a motor car. Besides, it would save the work of horses on the Lord's day, which is a point that would weigh with many good people. All the necessary work could be done on his machine on Saturday, so that all he would need to do would be to crank it and proceed to his destination.

Contractors, salesmen, collectors and the large class of men whose business necessitates their traveling from place to place find the automobile not only a great advantage, but in most cases a decided necessity and economy. It is less trouble and expense than the horse. It needs supplies only when in actual use on the road, while the horse requires many hours of attention, feed, bedding, etc., whether in use or not. Many of the small cars can be run at a cost of about one cent a mile. In nearly all cases, a car that is properly taken care of and not abused, will pay for its upkeep, even if used only for pleasure.

Grocers, butchers and bakers in rural towns have to cover considerable distances in serving customers. These routes may average from fifteen to twenty miles or more a day, which, while it is a day's work for a horse, is a mere trifle for a machine. One rural store-keeper in a Hudson River town put the case concisely when he said: "I can now do my deliveries in less than half the time and have more leisure to give attention to the store and to other business. Besides, since I bought my machine, there are no complaints of late deliveries, which is a great point with us storekeepers. It does away with the waiting for the grocer, the butcher and the baker and relieves the anxiety of the housewife, and lets people get their meals on time. Many will not trade with a store that cannot guarantee quick deliveries and this can only be done with a machine. Formerly, it required two wagons to make my deliveries about the town, and two days a week, when I made deliveries to the outlying country districts, an extra wagon was put into service. Now, my machine does the work for all routes, taking double the load and using less than half the time."

The War on the Cigarette

A FEW days before the closing of the Children's Home at Montclair, the Rev. Manfred P. Welcher, field secretary and lecturer of the Anti-Cigarette League of America, No. 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, was invited to visit the Home and speak to the children. The little folks listened intently, especially the boys, while Mr. Welcher was speaking. He told them of the evils of tobacco, how it affected mind, body and morals. Many of the leading business houses and great corporations have refused to employ any one using tobacco. He explained that the Anti-Cigarette League is seeking to inform children of the perils that lurk in tobacco and endeavoring to pledge them against its use as well as against the use of liquor. The League also stands for the enforcement of State laws against the sale to or use of tobacco by minors. The pledge circulated by the League appeals to all that is manly and heroic in the boy's nature, and stirs the noblest and strongest impulses. Many unknowingly contract the evil habits, who, if kindly warned, would avoid them. "If we are to have young men a few years hence who are acceptable to employers," said Mr. Welcher, "we must save the boy now by guarding him from tobacco. Business men and others in Chicago and Boston are generously supporting the League's work in these cities, and those of New York will gladly do the same when they know its value in fighting an evil which is as alluring as it is disastrous to the body, mind and morals of children."

The Anti-Cigarette League is enlisting a "million club" of boys and their friends to fight tobacco and liquor. Their motto is "Save the Boy." The pledge is for a stated period, or for life, as the signer prefers. It is signed in duplicate, one card being kept by the boy who signs it. The card will thus serve as a recommendation to employers who wish to know about a boy's habits. There is also a League button and a nominal ten cent membership fee. The League membership is growing rapidly throughout the country. Sunday Schools, churches and other organizations may address Secretary Welcher at 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

WHEN MOTHER USED THE SHINGLE

THAT I was quite a wilful lad,
With sorrow I confess;
And yet I was not really had,
'Twas mostly thoughtlessness.
But thinking now of my wild ways,
Smiles with my tears do mingle,
As I recall the olden days
When mother used the shingle.

My sterner parent used the "cat";
My! how it used to cut;
Yet, Spartan-like, I bowed to that Without a whimper, but
When exercising a like art,
Though not a blow would tingle,
It used to almost break my heart,
When mother used the shingle.

Ne'er was there anger in her eyes,
Nor e'er my father's fire,
Yet with each blow I'd bear the sighs
That kindled my desire
To try within the bounds to keep;
The right from wrong to single;
And as it was, I used to weep,
When mother used the shingle.

Some future day, when poor me dies,
My friends will all drop in;
And I'll be lauded to the skies
As though a saint I'd been.
If then no crime they can deplore,
I pray let one truth jingle;
I owe it to the days of yore,
When mother used the shingle.

Self—or Christ?*

IT is said that the keenest among us are unable fully to probe the motives which actuate them.

We are generally moved to our deeds by many combined and involved considerations. Of these, the world is apt to attribute to us the worst, while we ourselves feel that we have acted from the very best.

The heart of man is deceitful and desperately wicked, says the psalmist. We must judge ourselves severely and must not allow ourselves even as much charity as we give to others.

One thought which has sometimes worried very conscientious persons should not be too strongly dwelt upon. It is that no matter how much we deny ourselves and suffer for Christ's sake, we are sure in the end to be rewarded, so that when we work for Christ, no matter how disinterested we may try to be, we are really benefiting ourselves.

That may be so; but we need not concern ourselves with what will happen to us in the end. Let us work for Christ, keeping his cause first in our thoughts, and then leave with him the matter of our reward.

One of our notorious modern infidels has written a book in which he heaps abuse upon the Christian religion.

Among other ignoble and depressing statements he says, in effect, that there was never a more immoral command than that of Christ to love our enemies, to pray for them that persecute us, and to lay down our lives for others.

He insists that our duty is to ourselves first of all. The great modern doctrine called "individualism" is carried by him to its fullest extent.

For, according to this writer, there is no immortality and no God. The worlds in space came into existence through some mechanical law. Their origin is the only riddle he finds in the universe.

Can you imagine any theory more gloomy and depressing?

The man cannot prove his assertions, and he says that we cannot prove ours. But surely our view of a noble and beneficent Maker and Ruler of the universe is far more reasonable and sensible than his. The doctrine of immortality is far more inspiring and beautiful than is his of annihilation after death. And all this, even if we should have to depend solely on mere human and so-called "scientific" testimony, without that wonderful, inspired volume, which presents the most rational and exalted theory of existence, of conduct and of future rewards among those of all the nations.

The most shocking contrast between the infidel theories of this writer and those of our Bible lies, perhaps, in their philosophy of life.

Christ says, "Live for others. Forget yourself, except in so far as you must care for yourself in order to be of service to others."

This infidel says, "Take care of yourself first of all. Your welfare is the chief thing for you to consider. This is the only life to live. Make the most of it for yourself."

To the Christian this doctrine is revolting.

If you stop to reflect upon those in history to whom the most honor and love are given, you will find that they are those who presented examples of self-sacrifice; the martyrs of the days of persecution; the great missionaries who exiled themselves, endured unspeakable insults and hardships, and, in imitation of their beloved Leader, freely delivered themselves up to danger and death for the sake of others; and the great soldiers who fought for their country. Abraham Lincoln is almost adored. The selfish and tyrannical Napoleon makes us admire his intellect but despise his character.

Christian Stewardship*

THE statement may seem extreme, but it is probably strictly true, that the prevailing idea among rich Christians to-day is this of Christian stewardship.

Never were the holders of great wealth so concerned as now with the question how best to benefit the world with it. For every selfish, so-called Christian millionaire, it may be safely reckoned that there is at least one other who is casting about for the best way of spending his money for Christ.

The secretary of one of our great benevolent associations received a few years ago a visit from a stranger who confessed that he had been so deeply absorbed in his business that he had not had time to look into outside matters. Now he was beginning to take a little more leisure, and he wanted to put a million dollars into some good cause, or causes.

"What is most needed?" he said. "I do not know of what kind of institutions we have enough, and what are still lacking. I want to establish some memorial for my mother. Advise me."

The secretary told him that two things were urgently needed. One was a home for weak women just out of the hospital, but not yet able to work. Another was a vacation home for working girls.

Now, in one of the green spots not far from the metropolis, stand two noble, well endowed institutions, built by the generosity of this wise steward.

The secretary who has been referred to, says that he has many times been similarly appealed to, but never for so large an investment. Still, he knows that many very rich men are constantly investigating different charities, with a view to giving to the most worthy.

One of the most remarkable features of our great national prosperity, is the large number of millionaires who have only a local recognition, and sometimes not even that.

Thus the gentleman who gave these two splendid homes was unknown to the general public, until their dedication brought him into prominence. The great Fayerweather benefactions were the first intimation to the vast majority of his countrymen that such a man as Mr. Fayerweather existed. And so it has been with many others.

But the chief source of income to our churches and our missionary and other philanthropic objects must ever be the mass of littles made up from the contributions of those in moderate circumstances.

President Dwight of Yale impressed it constantly upon his alumni, that the steady stream of their small gifts, if presented regularly every year, would amount to more than the sum of the great benefactions; and better than the money itself would be the interest and loyalty developed by the constant thought. Each man giving five dollars per year would love his alma mater far better than if he should refrain from giving because he could bestow so little.

The result has been a great fund which can be devoted to the general purposes of the university and is of immeasurable usefulness.

George Matheson, in an eloquent panegyric upon charity, admits that it is often misplaced, but reminds us that out of many seeds cast into the ground, some are sure to fructify.

"Say not that thy work was wasted though thy charity has rescued but one. Hast thou measured the strength that may be in one?"

The table of proportional expenses found in the "notes" is of great value and should be carefully studied by every member of the League.

"Give, and it shall be given unto you."

Note This Box

It is made of wood fibre and paraffin. Dampness, odors, germs or dirt can't get into it. It is proof against all that contaminates bag salt.

Note the patent top. Salt cellars can be filled in a jiffy without wasting a grain.

This is the ideal box in which your grocer sells Shaker Table Salt.

Always Flows Freely

Shaker is the salt that never clogs. No shaking, pounding and poking.

You find it in every fine hotel and café. Why not have the same salt in your home?

It will cost you only 10 cents per year more than coarse, soggy salt.

Free from Gypsum

But the main fact is that this salt is pure, while all other table salt contains gypsum.

Gypsum is plaster of Paris — the base of gravel and gall stones. It forms into balls in the body and clogs the liver, kidneys and spleen.

We remove this gypsum by an elaborate process — a process which we own. Skaker is the only table salt which is free from it.

All good grocers supply Shaker Salt. Price (east of the Rockies) 10 cents per box.

onvenience and implement, and is oreover backed by rich capitalists in urope and America, like the Roth- hilds and Schiffs; whereas the native not only ignorant and unprogressive, t when such is not the case, the lack surplus funds ties his hands and rces him under."

To my mind this scare is needless, d that because of the Jew himself. o begin with, the Jew has as much ght to buy property here, there and erywhere, if he pays for it, as any; d to settle on his land. But further, e Zionist, I believe, in aspiring too gh has defeated his own ends. Some me ago a Zionist syndicate petitioned e Young Turks to sell them Pales- ne, and grant them autonomy. The College, for instance, the cost runs up to $120 to $140 a year.

I have often been asked if the new régime in Turkey is favorable to Christianity. Well, it is, and it is not. The majority of Young Turks are men who have been educated in Europe, and consequently possess liberal minds, and a tolerant attitude towards Christainity. There will be no hindrance to the preaching of the Gospel from this quarter. On the other hand, the reform movement has indirectly revived Islam in a most unexpected way. The feeling of brotherhood which dominated men's minds in the first days of the Constitution has changed into one of suspicion and distrust. The Moslem fanatic—and he forms ninety-six per urks are willing to accede to the first rt of the petition, in order to enrich eir treasury, which is well nigh npty, but never to the second. Au- nomy for Palestine would in time ell the disintegration of the wholo ttoman Empire. The agricultural, e commercial, the social and the edu- tional masters of Palestine the onists are allowed and welcome to ; but the political, never!

A question even more pressing than riculture has been pressing for lution. I refer to public education. t present only fifty per cent. of the pulation, under the most flattering timate, can read and write. About ve per cent. of the total number of ys, and one per cent. of the girls, in e country attend school. Of these arly the half are on the rolls of estern institutions.

Obligatory public education was one the first laws enacted by the new rliament. Night schools were opened large centres, where Turkish and her subjects were taught free of arge. Native contributors came for- rd and endowed small establish- nts, a thing which was never known fore. In Lebanon one man gave all s fortune—several thousand dollars to the building, furnishing and man- ng of a small local school. In Jeru- lem four native young men—two ristians and two Mohammedans— t their heads together and the result s that now they own one of the ost popular schools in the city. The me things happened in Jaffa, Bei- t and other centres.

The old mission schools of England d America are being severely put to e test, and many of these have had to ange their course in order to meet th modern requirements. People are w ready to pay for education. From ty to seventy-five dollars is the erage cost per capita of board and ition at ordinary schools; whereas at lleges, such as the Syrian Protestant cent. of the population—sees nothing in the new régime but a secret plot to overthrow Islam. Even more than his distrust of the Christian is his suspicion of the reforming Young Turk. Secular education he rejects on the ground that its ulterior aim is to teach toleration of all creeds, which must eventually react on Islam.

The Home of the Soul*

CHARLES WAGNER has made for himself a warm place in the American heart. In spite of a certain mysticism and sentimentalism, which belong to the Latin rather than to the Anglo-Saxon, he has still a practical side, which deeply appeals to us, and, best of all, he has the loving heart, which wins all races and varieties of men.

The title of this, his newest book, is the name of his new church on the Place de la Bastile, in Paris, so called, he says, "because its purpose is to furnish shelter and a warm welcome to all those who are in search of a soul or are already in possession of one."

Every word to be said within those walls, he declares, is expressly addressed to the inner soul of every hearer—that divine depth in which lies the vital spark of true being, waiting to be fanned into a flame which shall animate and transform the life.

In these charming discourses the hearers are begged to follow Christ, in his simplicity; his undeviating decision; his benevolence. Admitting that when reduced to cold, worldly terms, the life of one of Christ's followers does not seem to align with common sense, he yet pleads with us to deny ourselves, leave all and follow him, eloquently describing the rewards of Christ, which so greatly surpass all earthly benefits. The lessons of the evangelists, he tells us, "are not above the heads of the smallest children and yet are as high as the farthest stars," and all of them call upon us for self-sacrifice.

"The Spirit of Evil," he continues, "can be thus distinguished: it scoffs at God, at his works and at his creatures"—an admirable and fresh discrimination.

He begs for the unity of all creeds on his favorite platform of universal love and unselfishness, and the immortality of goodness. He has a strong chapter upon marriage and divorce, in which he says: "The destiny of man is linked with that of woman; they are of one flesh, of one substance, of equal dignity. Effort and combat are necessary before it will be possible for woman to receive her just due. But let not the ardor for their cause lead the champions of woman into separating it from the cause of man."

As ever with this remarkable man and preacher, love is the keynote of all his teachings. In the sermons to the young, of which this volume contains several, this great motive is constantly presented. The high poetic quality of his eloquence casts, in its truest sense, a spell upon the reader, and it is to be hoped that not only our ministers, but our young people and our laymen as well, will drink in his spirit from this newest book of the great Alsatian preacher.

Men and Missions†

MR. ELLIS reminds us of the wonderful modern changes in transportation and communication which have revolutionized missionary methods. "The contiguity of the nations," he says, "has created a whole new set of perplexities and problems. Cheek by jowl we must stand together, bearing common burdens, facing common conditions."

He quotes the famous saying of Joseph Cook, now recognized as a vit truth: "The nineteenth century h made the world one neighborhood; t twentieth century should make it o brotherhood"; and yet Mr. Ellis pr nounces the task an heroic one, f strong men only. It is to be a war f the right, needing "martial virtues of the kind which Professor James c scribes as those which spring in t social realm from "the moral equiv lent of war." But Mr. Ellis says th men can be found of the true hero stamp, and that many of them a already on the field.

He is unsparing in his denunciati of the failure of the church to ac quately support its missions. "T mission work," he says, "is the bigge in the world, and it should be done the biggest manner in the world by t biggest men in the world." The tem tation is strong to quote whole pag from this interesting book. It wholly unconventional, and unlike a other in the missionary library, havi been written by an independent la man, from the outside, and yet in fu sympathy with those on the insic Thus missions are presented from viewpoint entirely different from t usual one. The reader will not nece sarily agree with all of the very pos tive advice and statements of Mr. Elli but he will find them quite worth co sidering.

The Nation's Drink Bill

EVERY month of the present year has recorded an astonishing increase in the consumption of spirits or beer, or both. The Associated Prohibition Press Bulletin for May 28 last shows as the record of the United States Internal Revenue Department for the first nine months of the present year, the following increased consumption of spirits and fermented liquors:

		Gals. Spirits.	Bbls. Beer.
July and August,	1909,	1,219,999	497,747
September,	1909,	658,395	*132,167
October,	1909,	981,776	*194,869
November,	1909,	1,120,281	606,947
December,	1909,	1,431,166	*57,345
January,	1910,	1,586,806	177,694
March to April, (latest)		973,768	914,570
Total net increase for first 9 months of fiscal year 1910		9,114,977	1,876,529
			58,172,337 gals.
Total net increase in gallons both beer and whisky . . .			67,287,314.

*Decrease.

Since April 1, the monthly reports for April and May show this additional increase:

		Gals. Spirits.	Bbls. Beer.
April,	1910,	921,340	500,705
May,	1910,	847,739	474,408
Eleven months' total,		10,883,056	2,851,842
			98,407,102 gals.

The figures already at hand indicate that taking the American Grocer's own bases of value, this year will show not less than $100,000,000 increase in the value of liquors consumed over that of the year to which your editorial and the American Grocer's article refer. This is, of course, not quite so encouraging from a superficial viewpoint as the totals for last year seem to be; but we believe that the increase shown this year does not in any way mean a retrograde movement for the temperance or Prohibition reform: on the contrary, they are a warning and guide which should not be ignored by any worker for civic righteousness.

In the first place, the surprising increase in the consumption of liquor this year is due, to some extent at least, to the "resumption of prosperity" and the emerging of trade in general from the panic of 1907. In the second place, millions of gallons of liquor are being sold in defiance of public sentiment in Prohibition States and cities under the protection of the present Federal inter-State regulations. In the third place, in almost every State and district where "no license" has been hastily won, after an emotional campaign, the people find themselves with Prohibition on the statute books, but with weak, liquor-sympathizing officials in office, who are doing their best to nullify the law, ignore their oaths and shield the law-breaking agents of outside brewers and distillers in surreptitious and illegal sales.

From wide correspondence which has reached our desk in recent months, we believe that the people in the country at large are more strongly in favor of Prohibition than ever before, and that these handicaps and alliances of officials with the liquor outlaws will soon precipitate a far more indignant and widely extended uprising on the part of voters than has already occurred. Prohibitionists are taking a more active part in the campaign this year than ever before, the dominant issue of their platform being everywhere: "Congress must prohibit all inter-State traffic in liquor," so that each State of the Union may hereafter have the full right to settle the liquor question as it may wish and be no longer at the mercy of the brewer and distiller in other States, as at present. The various leaders of the National Prohibition movement are being named for Congress in strategic districts in every State, and aggressive campaigns are being launched. We believe that right here is the point of most vital importance for all friends of the Prohibition cause — that unless we can defend the territory already won, stamp out nullification, and replace unfaithful officials, bosses and liquor parties, with able champions of the people's rights and of Prohibition as well, there is great danger of losing much, if not all, of the ground partially won during the last ten years.

These facts by their very importance demand recognition from all students of the Temperance and Prohibition reform, and reveal a condition of affairs at present exactly the reverse of that which appeared to be the situation last year. That is why I am prompted to write you thus at length, and I am sure that in fairness to the temperance cause you will be glad to give space to this statement of facts.

FRED D. L. SQUIRES.

Temperance Notes

—DRINKING water neither makes a man sick, nor in debt, nor his wife a widow.—John Neal.

—A WRITER in the American Issue points out the gratifying fact that there is not in either House of Congress a member who represents liquor interests, nor is there any Governor of a State who is a brewer, or a distiller, or a wholesale liquor dealer; from which he logically concludes that the liquor interest is incapable of bringing any man to the front or to an honorable position in the public service.

GREAT VALUE FOR THE MONEY

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD always take a keen interest in our premium propositions because THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has always "made good" when it has promised something attractive in books and pictures to accompany the paper to the homes of the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family.

It is doubtful if any other publication in the country sustains such close personal relations with its readers. Thousands of them, on receiving premiums, have sent us warm expressions of gratitude. It is, of course, impossible to print all of these letters on account of lack of space, much as we should like to do so. Below, however, we give two of recent date, showing what readers in different parts of the country think of this year's premiums:

"Dear Christian Herald: I received your valuable premiums; I consider the book Five Hundred Fascinating Animal Stories alone worth the dollar and fifty cents which I gave for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The picture, "Daughters of Dorcas," is exquisite, and the calendar is a little sleeping beauty.

"Yours truly,
"Arlington, N. J. WM. W. LEE."

Another, writing in the same enthusiastic vein, gives her opinion of the great value of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD premiums:

"Dear Sir: Many thanks for the nice presents, "The Daughters of Dorcas" and the "Dreamland" Calendar, you sent me. I do not think I ever received so much for $1.50 before in my life. Have shown and will show them to others. Hope I can get you some subscribers, as you will need many to be able to give so much for the money.

"MRS. ANNA C. HILLS.
"Westfield, Mass."

These are but specimens of the letters which keep coming to our office, showing the feeling of our readers in regard to the great efforts put forward by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to give the most interesting and valuable premiums at the least cost of any monthly, weekly or daily in America.

When this baby, George Neil Driscoll, of Norton, Kansas, was four months old, he could not be nourished until NESTLÉ'S FOOD was given him. It agreed with him from the first feeding and he gained a half a pound in four days. He is now a year old—perfectly well and strong—a true NESTLÉ baby.

Nestlé's Food

From the 7th to the 12th Month Protect Your Baby for these are the critical months when baby must be weaned. Don't wean the baby suddenly. Give it three or four feedings of mother's milk and one feeding of NESTLÉ'S FOOD at first; than later more NESTLE'S and less mother's milk; until finally you use NESTLÉ'S altogether.

And so, you bridge with NESTLÉ'S that critical period when baby first ventures on something besides its mother's milk.

This is the period when NESTLÉ'S has been most wonderfully helpful to mothers and babies—for NESTLÉ'S is so close to mother's milk that the baby feels no difference. Cow's milk will not answer at all for baby either at this period or at any other period. Cow's milk contains many elements that are found in mother's milk, but it doesn't mix them right. For instance, cow's milk has too much indigestible curd, and too little sugar. Besides, cow's milk is full of germs. Every Board of Health tells you that.

NESTLÉ'S FOOD is the richest cow's milk, secured from sanitary dairies, purified and modified until it is exactly like mother's milk.

And NESTLÉS FOOD is easily and quickly prepared. Just add cold water and boil two minutes, and you have all ready for the baby the best substitute for mother's milk science has yet devised.

Recommended by doctors, by mothers, by chemists — NESTLÉ'S FOOD has built healthy babies in for forty years in every corner of the globe.

We want to add your baby to our family of vigorous, healthy children, so we will send you free a full 25-cent package of NESTLÉ'S FOOD.

At the same time we will send you our book on the care of the baby—its clothes—food—baths, etc., written by an eminent specialist.

Send the coupon for both now, while it is handy.

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

A. B. C., Leavenworth, Kan. A girl in Leavenworth, on January 1, 1910, completed her nineteenth year of attendance at the Presbyterian Sabbath School without missing a Sunday, and is now in her twentieth year of this record. Do you know of a longer record than this for a young person?

It is certainly a wonderful record and she must have begun very young. We have had longer records of unbroken attendance, but they were from much older people. We would be glad to hear from any reader who knows of a better record than this for a girl or boy under twenty.

S. J. L., Memphis. By what race was the god Ra worshiped? What does he represent?

Ra was one of the Egyptian gods. He was identified with the sun. He is represented in sculpture as a hawk-headed man. The god Osiris only exceeded him in importance.

F. B., Perry, Mich. What is the meaning of the word "generation" as used in Scripture, and how shall we determine the date of the beginning or end of one generation, to distinguish it from another?

"Generation" is used in a variety of senses in the Scriptures. In some cases, it means a period of limitless duration; in others it means the past (Isa. 51: 8), and still others the future (Ps. 100:5); again it means both the past and future (Ps. 102: 24). In Gen. 6: 9 it means all men living at any given time. In Prov. 30: 11, 14 it refers to a class of men with some special characteristics, and in Ps. 49: 19 it may be interpreted to mean the "dwelling-place." A generation, in modern phrascology, means thirty to thirty-five years, but there is no instance of the word being used in this particular sense in the Bible. Thus, "the book of the generation of Jesus Christ" is a genealogical record extending back to Abraham. In I. Peter 2: 9 it means an elect race.

W. E. D., Alturas, Calif. Did Christ ever entertain Judas as his special guest at table, and if so where can I find the record of it in the Bible?

There is no record that Judas was so entertained at any time, to the exclusion of the other disciples. It is reasonable to suppose that he was present with the others when they sat down to meat and that he took part in all of their activities, traveling with them, and acting as their steward and almoner (John 12: 6; 13: 29).

Subscriber, Neb. A minister here lately said that the most successful church in New York City had a pool room, billiard table and dance hall. What constitutes a successful church? Is it members? If these amusements are not only to be tolerated, but encouraged in the church, where is the dividing line? And why should we try to get our young people into the church when they can get all these amusements on the outside without any compunctions of conscience?

The church is not a free-and-easy, a concert ball, an amusement parlor or a school of dancing and deportment. It is the Lord's house, where, under a good and faithful pastor, the people are taught the vital truths of religion and the way of salvation. The true criterion of a church's success is not the extent and variety of its social diversions, nor the attractiveness of its entertainments, however innocent and wholesome these may be in themselves, but the spiritual character and godly lives of its people, and their earnest and faithful efforts for the extension of Christ's kingdom in the hearts of men. The poorest church, financially, may be the richest in spiritual gifts and graces. There are many advantages in having a social side to the church, but it should not be overdone and should never hinder or obscure the real mission of the church, which is the winning of immortal souls.

H. H. K., Halifax, Nova Scotia. Is the panorama a recent invention, or was this style of picture known to the ancients?

The panorama was the invention of Robert Barker, who made a circular painting of the city of Edinburgh, and exhibited it there about 1788. Barker went to London and started other exhibitions, giving to them the name panorama. He died April, 1806.

A. S., Washington, D. C. Please explain the parable of the unclean spirit, Matt. 12: 43-45. When the unclean spirit has gone out of a man, it is commonly supposed that he is a believer in Christ, and just why he should take seven other spirits worse than himself (if this refers to the man) puzzles me.

This exceedingly vivid illustration resembles those in Luke 11: 21-26. In both of the latter the soul is pictured as a residence of the evil one. In the one parable (Luke 11: 22) this mysterious enemy is described as strong; in the other as unclean. But here the resemblance ceases. The strong enemy is grappled with and overcome, and the house is permanently occupied by the victor; but in the other case, the unclean enemy goes out only to come in again, in which case "the last state of that man is worse than the first." Both are cases of conversion; but in one it is partial and al ive, and in the other, thorough and enduring The sevenfold diabolic force is a figure of ech, seven being the symbolical number of co lete- ness. Now, here is the great point of ffer- ence between these two men: the one sted and with divine help overcame, and t he took Christ into his heart to fully occupy the other succeeded for a time in driving the emy out, but he did not take Christ in. Th res- ence of Christ in the heart, in full pos sion, is the best defense against the attacks of n.

G. R. B., Pilot's Point, Tex. Is there a dif- ference in the terms Holy Ghost an Holy Spirit?

They are synonymous. The Holy Gh t or Spirit is the title of the third Person the Godhead.

A. N., Benn, Ind. Please explain Rom. 16 I. Cor. 16:20; I. Peter 5: 14.

The custom of kissing by way of sal tion prevailed among the Jews, and was ado d in the Christian churches as the symbo f a higher fellowship than it had ever ex ssed before. It was simply an expression of ris- tian affection and brotherhood, and w im- printed on the forehead or cheek. th Oriental churches in early times, it wa ive after the celebration of the Supper. Th pas- sages in Corinthians and Peter refer this kiss of Christian love or "charity," af the Lord's Supper, when it was given as a oken of mutual forgiveness and the forgettin f all dissensions.

L. J. J., Harper's Ferry, W. Va. W be- came of Count Pulaski's famous ner, which his troops carried in the Ar ican Revolution?

The banner is in the possession of the ary- land Historical Society.

Referring to a recent paragraph in THE AIL- BAG on the development of the modern gan, G. K. Westwood, Denver, Col., writes that was probably much earlier than the time of himedes, to whom it is usually attributed.

Mr. Westwood adds: "The 'pan-pipes' co ined no minor chords, being even at the prese date purely diatonic in character, and as Jul was the father of these music-makers, the orga ust have been invented long before the Floo r at least long before Archimedes. It is my bel that these ancients had instruments of a mor evo- tional tone in their orchestral movement han we have to-day. Take Ps. 150 as an examp r a full orchestra. As we read it, we can i gine the combination of effect in the continuous aise' that resounds through the psalm, reac g a crashing climax in the sixth verse. 'Let ery- thing that hath breath praise the Lord. aise ye the Lord.'"

J. W. P., Pittsburg, Pa. How does a sh herd divide the sheep from the goats in les- tine?

The Oriental shepherd calls his she by sounds and signals which they are trai l to know. One peculiar call is used to sepa ate his flock from that of other shepherds, l to bring it to the watering troughs, and a ther distinctive call will send his flock back the field. The sheep know the call of the own shepherd. Dogs are employed in sheep-t ling and are of the greatest assistance to the ep- herd, so that when he calls his sheep the right side, to separate them from the sts, the dogs drive the goats to the left. W ave no reliable data as to the distance betwe cer- tain points in Syria, but you can estim e it on the scale furnished with most of the ps.

L. T., Atlantic City. Who wrote "God ade two great lights, great for their to man, the greater to have rule by da ?"

They are by Milton and appear in Boo II. of Paradise Lost, line 346.

M. B., Decatur, Ia. Has a man a legal ght to change his name to any other h nay choose?

Two cases of this kind came up in th ew York courts recently, which show how ges may differ. One judge refused to entert an application for change of a name, whi the petitioner claimed was detrimental to l in business, but which the court pronounce an honorable name, easy to pronounce and e to spell." Another judge, on a different a ca- tion, ruled that a person may change his me without resort to legal proceedings, and t to all purposes, the name thus assumed will ss legal as if it had been borne from birth. ere seems to be need of an authoritative ruli on the subject.

J. H. E., Philadelphia, Mrs. J. M. B., au- fort, S. C., W. B. J., Glade Spring, Va and several other readers have written us reg ing the paragraph in THE MAIL-BAG of Aug 31 relative to infant baptism in the early Chi n Church. A. B. U., Boston, points out hat Lydia (Acts 16: 14, 15) "was an active si- ness woman, without a husband," and the ore had no children in her household, of her o st least. He adds that "there is no mea of determining whether there were or wer not children of immature age in the househ of Stephanus (I. Cor. 1: 15) and that the me remark applies practically to Crispus (Ac 18:

AKE-SHOPS KNEE-DEEP IN SEWAGE

Rher a Startling Announcement—But hat Was the Condition of the Chicago Bake-shops After a Heavy Rain-storm—Where is Your Bread Baked?

akeries knee deep in sewage? Sounds rher startling, doesn't it? And yet this w the condition in which many Chicago b eries were found by the health in- sptor after a rain-storm. Do you buy yr bread? If so, you will be interested in e following extract from the article by Burton J. Hendrick in McClure's Magazine for August:

"An inspection showed that there ere about fifteen hundred bake- ops in Chicago, nearly all of them elow the pavement line. They were rty, begrimed catacombs, heated ith blazing red furnaces, thickly opulated with white-garmented, isty-faced, slow-moving figures. ometimes the bakers not only baked it slept in these caverns. They so used them as a shelter for their rsonal pets—in one sixteen dogs ere found. Naturally, it was not rprising that an impure air disease ce tuberculosis found many of its ctims here. The Health Commis- oner created a mild panic when he manded suddenly that the worst Chicago's bake-holes be closed d their occupants move into the nlight. Then came the familiar lk about 'personal liberty' a tyran- cal bureaucrat was interfering with e bakers' constitutional rights.' st then, however, an old-fashioned icago rain-storm set in, and the wers backed water. Chicago rned that it's 'staff of life' was ing kneaded and baked by hard rking men and women who were anding a foot or two in sewage."

ere is "food for thought." Of course the are clean bakeries and foul bakeries. The may be some doubt about ordinary baeries, but when it comes to shredded whit biscuit you know it is clean and pu and wholesome. It contains the en e wheat grain—not simply the white flo in the wheat kernel, which is mely starch—but all the rich, muscle-mang and brain-building material in the whe wheat grain, thoroughly cleaned, ste cooked, shredded and then baked cri and golden brown, in a two-million-do r sunlit bakery—the cleanest, finest bakry in the world. Two of these shilded wheat biscuits eaten for breakfas with milk or cream will supply all the strigth needed for a half day's work and will keep one in healthy, vigorous con tion. It is the only cereal breakfast foc that makes wholesome combinations wit fruit. Ask your grocer for it and giv it a trial.

8) and Cornelius (Acts 10: 2). Of course, the circumcision applied to male infants only. It should not be forgotten that Paul (in Col. 2: 11) speaks of the Colossian Christians as having been circumcised with a circumcision made without hands, when they were buried with Christ in baptism. The obvious reason for the comparison of the two rites (according to the view of leading commentators) is that circumcision was the entrance to the Jewish church and the ancient covenant, and baptism to the Christian Church and the new covenant. The spiritual resemblance might be carried even further. It need not be contended that infant baptism has or has not Scriptural warrant, and we do not know of any such contention. We can judge, however, from the view taken by the leaders of the Christian Church. The Augsburg Confession (Art. 9) states that baptism ought to be administered to children. The Westminster Confession (Art. 28) holds that the infants of believing parents should receive baptism. The 17th article of the M. E. Church, the articles of the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States (Art. 27) take the same ground.

S. D., E., Grand View, Ia. In Isa. 40: 31, please explain the meaning of the words "mount up," then "run," then "walk."

The use of the descending climax, as it is known in rhetoric, is here designed to describe in every attitude the praying, waiting child of God, who is strong in the Lord. It is not, as some might suppose, a case of backward progress or backsliding; but may be interpreted as meaning that in the strength of youth they shall mount, in the vigor of middle life they shall still run, and even in old age they shall walk and not faint, who trust in Him.

R. S., Bronxville, N. Y. From what do we get our expression "to raise a hue and cry"?

In ancient days in England it was the process of summary pursuit and arrest of a criminal caught in the act. It was the duty of every citizen to raise "the hue and cry," as it was called, and join in it. A felon caught by this volunteer posse with the evidence of his crime on him was not entitled to be heard in his defense, but on the evidence of the fact and the "hue and cry," was convicted and executed. It ended about the thirteenth century as a legal process, but the term is still used loosely for a disturbance.

Mrs. B. D., Minneapolis, Minn. Now that our population, according to the new census, will be in the neighborhood of 100,000,000, how do we compare with the older countries?

The United States now has a larger population than any country in Europe, except Russia. These are the figures: European Russia, 129,000,000; Germany, 63,000,000; Austria-Hungary, 50,000,000; Great Britain, 45,000,000; France, 39,000,000; Italy, 33,000,000; Spain, 20,000,000. The greatest gains abroad in population have been made by Germany and Russia, and the smallest by France. Our own census, however, will not quite reach the hundred million point.

M. M., Fayetteville, Ark. Is the "fruit pigeon" native to the United States?

No; it is only found in the Old World. Most of them are in India or the Malay Archipelago. They live entirely on fruit. None are in this country unless they have been imported by pigeon fanciers.

S. T., Fort Perry, Can. What is the significance of the name "God"?

"God" is from the same Saxon root as "good," thus expressing the divine benignity as the leading attribute of the most general term for the Deity. It has its equivalent in the Hebrew El, the Arabic Al, the Syrian Ilo, and the Phœnician El. The word "God" has come to signify, in Christian use, the Maker and Ruler of the world.

E. F., Greenwich, N. Y. Was there ever more than one Queen of England named Anne?

Yes; there were two. The first was Anne, daughter of the Earl of Warwick. She was born in 1456 and died in 1485. Richard of Gloucester compelled her to marry him and when he became king under the title of Richard III. in 1483 she became queen. The second was the Queen Anne who had so much to do with our colonial history. She was born in 1665 and died in 1714. She was the second daughter of James I., and married to Prince George of Denmark. The death of King William occurring in 1702, the terms of the Declaration of Rights made Anne queen and she was crowned April 23, 1702.

F. K. R., Wilber, Neb. 1. It is a duty to obey the law of the land. The Scripture (N. T.) recognizes only one cause for divorce. Unquestionably, many divorces are granted unjustly and for totally inadequate reasons. 2. Such cases have happened. If both are truly repentant, there might be no legal or moral objection.

Reader, Dawn, Mo. 1. The Epistle of James, as the opening verse shows, was written by the apostle personally, and is addressed not to any individual or particular community, but to Christians generally. 2. Revelation is supposed to have been written by John the Divine. There has been much discussion over the authorship, but the general belief of the majority of Christians in all ages has been in favor of John.

Among the Workers

—THE SEVENTY-FIFTH anniversary of the Palmer Holiness Meeting will be celebrated in the Seventeenth Street Methodist Episcopal Church, New York City, Sunday, September 25.

—AN ORDAINED clergyman, experienced as an evangelist, would take charge of mission work or fill openings as pulpit supply. Unsectarian, Hebrew and Greek scholar, with degrees from two leading universities. He may be addressed, "Pastor, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

—THAT THE "man on the street" is more than willing to listen to an out-door Gospel message, briefly and tersely put, is one of the clearly outstanding facts demonstrated by the National Bible Institute's summer campaign. The week-day services show no falling off in point of numbers and the Sunday meetings continue to be of an increasingly encouraging character.

—MISSIONARY WM. C. TERRIL, of the M. E. Mission, Inhambane, East Africa, writes acknowledging the gifts of Mrs. Laura Dodd and Mr. Andrew H. Dawley for the work at that station. He adds: "The parish we have here contains 3,000,000 souls. To evangelize these people we have fifteen missionaries, which means one to every 200,000. The entire out-station work is carried on by special gifts. Calls by the score reach us each week to open new work. Native chiefs pleaded with me when making my final round of the district a few weeks ago to send them teachers. They say that they are too old to learn to believe in the white man's God, but they want their children taught to believe. I promised to do my best to send teachers."

—THE AMERICAN PURITY Federation is about to open a vigorous campaign in the interests of the fight against White Slavery, and the general suppression of vice. Among the workers who will accompany the party are Ernest A. Bell and Arthur Burrage Farwell, of Chicago; Rev. Dr. J. G. Shearer, Toronto, Canada; Mrs. Della Thompson Lutes, Cooperstown, N. Y.; Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, New York City; Mr. James H. Patten, Washington, D. C.; Mr. John B. Hammond and Mrs. A. B. Sims, Des Moines, Ia.; Professor T. W. Shannon, St. Louis; Dr. Emma F. A. Drake, Denver; Rabbi Tobias Schanfarber, Chicago; Mr. W. L. Clark, Leamington, Ontario; Mr. J. Frank Chase, Boston; Owen O. Wiard, Springboro, Pa. Arrangements for conventions in various cities are now being made.

—THE WINONA ASSEMBLY and Summer School Association has just closed the most remarkable year in its history. Its "Sunday School End" is one of its great right arms. Not only does it maintain a strong Sunday School during the Assembly and Bible Conference (the attendance upon which sometimes exceeds 2,500), but for twelve days preceding the Bible Conference there was held a "Summer Training School for All Sunday School Workers," with the strongest faculty ever assembled for a school of this character. The Bible Conference exceeded in attendance and strength all previous conferences. The great auditorium was filled each day to hear such noted pulpit celebrities as Drs. Woelfkin, G. Campbell Morgan, J. Wesley Hill, George Stuart, Melvin E. Trotter and others. Dr. Hill's addresses on "Socialism and the Church" have had large hearing, especially by ministers.

—MISSIONARIES H. C. and Nellie Bartel write from Tsao Hsien, China: "We are living in the southwest corner of Shantung in one of the most thickly populated districts of China. There are so many poor people who cannot make a living. Grain is high and work is scarce. A widow has no way at all to support her children if she has no income. She can work out for her living, gets about 300 to 400 coppers a year, which amounts to about $1.50 American money. It is, therefore, a great blessing if such children are taken up so the mother can make her living. If a poor widower has children they are, as a rule, no better off than the former, because the only way to make a living is to work; he earns about half again as much as the woman, but it is not enough to support a child, and there is no place to put them. We have taken up quite a few children, who had no one at all and were just going from place to place begging. Chinese have told me that more than half of the thieves and robbers have taken to this profession because they had no way to make a living."

Ready for Christ's Return*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Craft

OF all the parables spoken by Christ, we might expect young women to be most interested in that about the ten virgins, and the same might be said of all women. But we are not therefore to conclude that there is nothing in it for boys and men, for they all have mothers; most of them have sisters, and men have wives and daughters.

The Wise and Foolish Virgins

"Five of them were foolish, and five were wise." They were all waiting for the coming of the bridegroom, after the Oriental fashion, and it was away into the night; all Oriental weddings occur in the night. Both the wise virgins and the foolish ones slumbered. The waiting was so long, it was right that they should sleep. Their lamps were all gone out or going out—nothing wrong about that; the lamps were very small, holding only a few spoonfuls of oil. Double up your hand by pressing your fingers against your thumb and you will have a shape that quite represents one of those lamps. The cry of "The bridegroom!" came about midnight and awoke the ten sleepers, and they proceeded to trim their lamps that they might join the bridegroom's procession, and enter into the house with him. Five of them could not trim their lamps, because they had brought no oil with them; they were the "foolish ones." But five had brought oil in small flasks, and they filled their lamps and lighted them; they were wise.

Did the foolish ones ask oil of the wise ones? Yes, they did, but they were refused. Shall we say that the "wise" were selfish? Not so, they had only enough for themselves, and if they had divided it, there would not have been enough for either! Those who had no oil went away to try to buy some. We are not told whether or not they succeeded in getting oil, but they came back asking to be allowed to enter the house, for in the meantime the bridegroom had come, and the door had been shut. But they received instead the word to go away: "Ye can not enter now."

Why did not the five virgins who had gone in try to help their disappointed sisters? Perhaps they might have passed their burning lamps out to them. We may share many things which we have, but there are some things which can not be shared.

What Each Person Must Acquire

A gentleman thus tells about his younger brother who was to make his first speech. "He was dreading the ordeal and when he came on the platform and began to speak he showed his lack of confidence. I would willingly have given him the benefit of my experience, but that was impossible. And so it is that a Christian often desires to impart to others his joy and happiness from trusting in Christ, but this is impossible; each person must acquire it for himself by faith."

Undoubtedly Christians have helped others to acquire this faith. To communicate to others the Light we have in our souls is a duty laid upon us by our God for women as well as men.

A heathen woman in a zenana, listening to a missionary lady reading the Bible to her, remarked: "Really, your Bible must have been written by a woman; it contains so many kind things about us. Our Shastras (sacred books) say nothing but what is hard of us."

In the Bible we have brief references to about one hundred women, each reference giving us a positive or negative fragment of the divine picture of a true woman; all together give us God's idea of the "ex[cellent] woman." The Bible has nothi[ng] say against physical beauty; c[on]trary it tells us of the rema[rk]able beauty of Rebecca and Esther; b[ut] beauty which the Bible exalts i[s] which is more than skin deep—beauty of character, which is "b[eau]tiful to God" and "a joy forever." Note this fact, that the women of pa[ssing] history whose faces and forms seem[ed] beautiful and lovely are those whos[e] were noble and heroic; not those whose lives were base and useless. Wh[o] that your imagination paints [as] the mother of Christ, and Ma[ry] Bethany with lovely faces? Also Hannah, and Deborah, and Rachel and Rebecca. Why do we thi[nk] Jezebel, Athaliah, Herodias and Sapphira with unpleasant, even repulsive faces? It is because in the light of a thousand years beauty of soul makes the deepest impression. Beautiful indeed must have been the face of the Syro-Phœnician mother filled with earnest prayer for her daughter, and the face of the Samaritan woman thrilled with enthusiasm for leading her townspeople to Christ. All faces, whether of men or women, through which the soul looks toward the Christ are beautiful indeed.

True Ornaments for Women

In all ages of the world women have given much attention to ornaments. But there are two kinds of ornaments, those of the spirit and those of gold and gems. Think of Cleopatra with her precious ornaments of gold, not ornaments of grace. Think of Jezebel with her queenly adornments, the vile within that she is spoken of as "the bloody Mary" of the first religious persecution. Compare with her Deborah, who is remembered as the leader of the first praying crusade against the enemies of God.

The most precious necklace a woman can wear is "the scarlet thread" of faith in Christ bequeathed by the converted Rahab. By this sign Rahab and all her household were saved when Jericho fell.

Another ornament for women is given by the hand of Dorcas: Industry. Many young ladies desire to make their names immortal by their pens, but Dorcas did it with her needle. She is even more famous for her charitable sewing than the four daughters of Philip for their preaching. The women of the Orient unconsciously secure more erect carriage and firmer step than other women by carrying burdens on their heads. So responsibility and activity give any woman increased bearing. Dorcas sends down also as an ornament for women the bracelet of benevolence. The most beautiful hand is the hand that gives. In old England it was formerly the custom for wealthy families to give bread to the poor on certain days by the hand of the mistress at the castle gate. She was therefore called "Lafdy," meaning the loaf giver, afterward contracted to the word "Lady." The true lady is one who gives bread not only for the bodies, but also for the souls of men, bread of sympathy, prayer, helpfulness, especially the bread of life which saves the soul from sin and hell and holiness and heaven.

The Legend of St. Elizabeth

One of the old legends of St. Elizabeth, of Hungary, wife of King Louis, pictures the beauty of the true lady the loaf-giver. She was accustomed to spend much of her time, when her harsh king was away from home, visiting the poor, a custom his husband opposed bitterly. One winter day when she was thus engaged with her robe full of bread for the needy she unexpectedly met her husband. When the king asked her what she was doing, she did not answer, but essed the robe more firmly together. e opened the mantle, but found only d and white roses. The legend says e thus escaped censure by the iraculous transformation of bread to roses, a type of the fact that God ansfigures all benevolence into beauty. The two mites that the poor widow ve to God's cause have made a eater stir in the world than all the ms which the richest women of that e possessed. And so the twenty-five llars' worth of ointment which ary of Bethany poured in loving atitude upon the feet of Jesus has nt forth a wider fragrance than all e costly perfumes of the richest man matrons of that day. Such men as Dorcas and Mary of Beth- y we must class with those five wise gins who carried oil in their vessels. d there are many like them in the rld to-day. Take for example that ble woman of India, who died more an a year ago—Lilavati Singh. She ld come to the United States to raise ney to build a Christian college for t women of her land. When she was i the hospital, and thought to be overing, she said: "I thought I was ng to die and go to heaven; then haps the women of America would sorry, and would finish my work as memorial to me, and all would be ll with me and with it." That ble and beautiful life must avail for v life to the people for whom she nted to live, and for whom she even d to die. Also to be classed with t five wise virgins are the Bible men in heathen lands—more than o thousand of such women are em- yed and superintended by various missionaries. It is related that in Krea a Bible woman named Sarah h persuaded a large number of men to destroy the things in their ises connected with devil-worship. Ce woman who had been a mutang (rceress) heard of the Holy Doc- ne through Sarah and asked that s be allowed to be a follower. She w told that her first step would be to troy all the things used by her as a ntang. To this she willingly agreed, a during one of the regular visits of Ster Sarah the whole mutang equip- nt was burned in the courtyard— a er which prayer was offered in the se, which the woman said "now felt cl n and peaceful." After that, she a her household became regular at- tdants at religious classes and ser- vs.

The "Jesus Teachers" of Burma

A Burmese Bible woman quaintly sd: "Formerly the people's faces we turned away from us, and they called us reproachfully the Jesus women, but now they call us respectfully the Jesus teachers."

In Madagascar a Christian Bible woman was sent to visit ten cities, where there were few people who ever entered a place of Christian worship, and where the majority could neither read nor write. At first she found the people very difficult to approach; they would shut themselves up in their houses or hide in the fields when she came among them; but after a while those who used to run away became most anxious to see her, and would ask her into their houses and listen to her willingly. When she could not reach the women in their homes she followed them to the fields, and talked to them there. And so she works while she waits for the coming of the Bridegroom.

Noble Women of Our Land

We do not need to go to heathen lands to find women who by their good works done in Christ's name are worthy of being classed with the five wise virgins. There are many such noble women in our own land, whose names are well known to us. A far larger number of such women are known only to those whom they lovingly and constantly help. God and the angels know all about them, and that is far better than to be known of men. The old sexton's wife sitting in the ancient church talking to the new curate was one of these. "They did say, sir, that I was a pretty girl once. I'm not much to look at now." And the curate thought her memory of it was as sweet as the old fragrance left in the withered leaves of roses. "But it du not matter, du it, sir? Beauty is only skin deep." "I don't believe that," he answered, "beauty is as deep as the heart at least." "Well, to be sure, my old husband du say I be as handsome in his eyes as ever I be. But I beg your pardon, sir, for talkin' about myself. I believe it was the old church." "The old church did not lead you into any harm, then," replied the curate. "The beauty that is in the heart will shine out of the face some day again, be sure of that. And after all there is just the same kind of beauty in a good old face that there is in an old church. You can't say the church is so trim and neat as it was the day that the first blast of the organ filled it as with a living soul. The carving is not quite so sharp, the timbers are not quite so clean. There is a good deal of mould and worm-eating and cobwebs about the old place, yet both you and I think it more beautiful that it was then."

The Advertiser's Story

WE are afraid that many people miss one of the most significant features of the advertising column. Good advertising means the telling of a story. We read papers and magazines to get the pleasure and educational benefit to be derived from the world's events; stories of travel, progress, convenience, catastrophes; stories political, social, and religious. But the editorial pages give little or no information relative to the mercantile side of life.

And so the men who labor and invent for our comfort at home, or the manufacturers who place their goods on the market, must tell their stories by means of paid advertisements. In fact, many if not most of the conveniences you now enjoy were probably brought to your attention in one way or another through the advertising column.

There are 65 of these little business stories in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, told by thoroughly reliable advertisers in whom we have confidence. You can learn something to your advantage by reading these advertisements, and you will at least find them interesting because the modern advertiser must necessarily make his advertising copy as interesting as the editorial copy in order to hold the attention of the reader. He also knows that his story must bear the stamp of truth or else it will not be believed. In fact, you could put in a very profitable evening, reading just the advertisements in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and considering the great commercial activities which inspire them.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

The Faith of a Child

THE late evangelist Edward Payson Hammond was known as the "Evangelist of the Children," and his love for the little ones was a very strong feature of his character. Many were the beautiful stories he told of simple child faith. At a meeting in a Western State, some years ago, he related the following:

There is a family in Detroit who are dependent upon a little child for the present sunshine of their lives. A few weeks ago the young wife and mother was stricken down to die. When the family physician called them together and in his solemn way intimated to them the truth—there was no hope—then the question arose among them, who would tell her? Not the aged mother who was to be left childless. Nor the young husband, who was walking the floor with clenched hands and rebellious heart. There was only one other, and at this moment he looked up from the book he had been playing with, unnoticed by them, and asked gravely:

"Is mamma doin' to die?"

Then, without waiting for an swer, he sped upstairs as fast a little feet would carry him. Fr and neighbors were watching by sick woman. They wonderingly ticed the pale face of the child climbed on the bed and laid his hand on his mother's pillow.

"Mamma," he asked in sweet, ca ing tones, "is you 'fraid to die?"

The mother looked at him with intelligence. Perhaps she had thinking of this.

"Who—told—you—Charlie?" asked faintly.

"Doctor, an' papa, an' gam everybody," he whispered. "Ma dear, doan' be 'fraid to die, 'ill mamma?"

"No, Charlie," said the y mother, after one supreme pan grief; "no, mamma won't be af

"The History of All Nations"

The Story of the World's Life

The Complete Set --- 15 Volumes Is Yours For Only . . . . . 3⅓ Cents a Day

Approximately two hundred and fifty thousand dollars have been expended on the production of this incomparable work, the Illustrated History of All Nations, which we now offer at exactly half the original price. Brilliant contributions from eminent scholars, the exhaustive system of indexing, and the topical arrangement of the text, combine to make this set of books not only a Superb Library of Historical Literature, but a Complete Encyclopedia of Historical Facts.

Beginning at the dawn of history, with the earliest record of the clay tablet or fragment of papyrus, and tracing the civil, social, intellectual and moral development of races and nations down to the present history-making day, every thread of the narrative unfolds new aspects of absorbing interest. As if under a magic spell we find ourselves transplanted to the obscure past of the Far East, surrounded with the barbaric pomp of pagan despotisms, swept along the checkered way of the ancient Israelites, or lost in "the glory that was Greece and the grandeur that was Rome."

Passing on to medieval ages, we trace the rise of barbaric peoples as they spread over all Europe, laying the foundation of a new civilization; see the birth of the great nations of Europe, and follow their destinies in the struggles for supremacy on land and sea.

The Fifteen Massive Volumes abound in brilliant passages of Description, Biography, Characterization and Anecdote, while throughout the fascinating narrative historical facts are presented in a direct, simple and forceful style that makes history easy to remember. The Customs, Manners, Dress and Occupations of the various tribes and nations that have peopled the earth are interestingly described, and special attention is given to the growth of Christianity.

To stand beside the mighty Nelson at Trafalgar as the English fleet sweeps the power of France from the sea, to visit the broken-hearted Napoleon exiled on St. Helena, to see our own splendid Washington at Valley Forge and know the great Lincoln as he really was, teach us lessons of character that cannot readily be effaced. To quote from the Rev. W. C. Bitting of New York, "Every parent should put the Illustrated History of All Nations within reach of his children."

Unique Special Features of the Set

Illustrations.—338 Full-Page Illustrations enhance the beauty of the Illustrated History of All Nations—exquisite half-tone engravings. These Rare Illustrations are reproductions of famous paintings by master artists, most of the originals being in the great galleries abroad. Every volume is further enriched by a splendid frontispiece in rich color. Sixty-Four Finely Engraved Maps, historical, political and geographical, are added to the many special features of this matchless edition. These maps—many of which were specially draughted for this work—are invaluable to the student. Index.—No more complete system of indexing has ever been devised. Each volume contains its table of contents. Every chapter is then subdivided into sections, and the contents of each section is indicated by a subhead in large type. To further summarize the text, a memorandum of each paragraph is printed in bold type on the wide margin of every page. Finally, in the last volume is the General Index to the complete work. Binding.—The Fifteen Massive Volumes are handsomely bound in a beautiful silk-finish cloth stamped in genuine gold, with the lettering in gold on a deep red panel. The Type is large and clear, and the paper is an especially heavy, rough-finish stock, having a particularly beautiful texture. The 338 Exquisite Illustrations, on fine coated paper, are full-page inserts. 5,000 Large Pages—Nearly 3,000,000 Words.

And we start with a record of amazing success, such as none ever approached in this industry.

Cost Reduced 8%

We will continue to manufacture a line of five models, the same as produced in 1910; but, as a result of an investment of $3,000,000 in new equipment, these five models, as well as all new models, have been reduced in cost to the consumer an average of 8%—making 28% in two years.

We have made this reduction in spite of the advance in materials, the great jump in rubber, the increase in wage. We have done it while other makers of low-profit cars have been forced to advances, in one way or another.

Now the Overland gives the most for the money by a margin much greater than ever.

Fore Doors Included

The new Overlands are made with fore doors and without — your choice at one price. The fore door models, for which most makers charge an extra price, sell the same as the open front.

We do this because fore doors will be the coming vogue. In Europe, where motor styles are set, 97 per cent. of this year's models are shown with fore doors.

Soon or late, every motor car maker must include fore doors at his standard price. So the Overland, in maintaining its lead, is doing just that this year.

22 Attractive Designs

The improvements of this year are mainly in refinements of designs. Overland mechanism can hardly be further perfected. It brought this car, in two short years, to the dominant place in this line.

Our master designers have this year created 22 attractive models, largely based on foreign trend. The best of them will take their place among the most attractive cars in the world. No cars are made at any price with better style, or lines, or finish.

Prices for 1911

The Overland prices for 1911 begin at $775 for 20-horsepower — 4 cylinders — and $850 for a Torpedo Roadster with 4 cylinders.

The 25-horsepower Overlands sell at $1,000 and $1,095, according to style of transmission. The 30-horsepower Overlands sells at $1,250. So does an inside drive coupe.

The prices run to $1,600 and $1,675 for the finest cars possible in 35-horsepower with 118-inch wheel bases. Every price includes a magneto and full lamp equipment.

No other make gives so much for the money. No other make gives better than our best, save in excessive power.

THE GREAT FLOODS IN MIDDLE JAPAN

ALTHOUGH little more than a few brief paragraphs have come by the cable, telling of the recent floods in central Japan, letters just eceived from Americans in that country who have een eye-witnesses of the inundation, show that it lmost reached the proportions of a national disas-er. Fifteen prefectures, viz.: Saidama, Gunba, hiba, Tochigi, Miyagi, Wagano, Yamanashi, Shid-uoka, Kanagawa, Ibaraki, Aichi, Fukushima, Iwate, 'amagata and Akita, were affected, and hundreds f villages were for several days under water. The ain was a perfect deluge, incessant, terrifying and estructive. It lasted nearly four ays. On the second day—indeed, n fourteen hours—twenty inches of ain fell. It was this devastating ownpour that did most of the amage. Over 800 persons per-shed, some 200 were injured and everal hundred are reported miss-ng. More than 2,000 dwellings ere wrecked by the deluge, which wept many hundreds of houses way altogether. It is estimated hat nearly 400,000 buildings in all ere more or less damaged by the ood, and that between 200,000 and 00,000 persons are suffering. Re-ef work has been going on vigor-usly, however, and the authorities n the various prefectures are doing ll in their power to repair the amage and restore normal condi-ons, the military and naval forces o-operating with them in this ork.

Rev. Edwin T. Iglehart, an merican missionary at Hirosaki son of Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, f the editorial staff of THE CHRIS-IAN HERALD), has sent the follow-ng graphic description of the flood. fe and his brother, Rev. Charles V. Iglehart, of Tokyo, were eye-itnesses of and participants in the events he escribes. One can gather, from what he writes, hat it was a busy and exciting time for the mis-ionaries and the foreigners generally, who did all ney could to save life and property and to lessen uman suffering. His letter is given below:

"I suppose you have had newspaper despatches bout the great floods in Japan. We hardly know et just how bad things are, because we have been lmost completely cut off from the outside world for week; but telegrams are now getting through, and we learn that there have been heavy losses of life and property. We feel that we have all been very fortunate here, for there has been no loss of life in Karinzawa. Forty men were killed a little distance from here—between here and the next town.

"There have been busy and anxious times here, and many summer residents have been driven out of their homes. I'll try and tell you something about it, though the days and nights of the past week are pretty much confused in my mind. We have had considerable rain during this month, but it did not become steady till a week ago Sunday night. It rained all day on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. That afternoon, a man stopped at the door to say that some people at the end of the village were in trouble. There are several streams flowing down through the village ordinarily, but none much too wide to jump across. Our cottage is in the safest part of town and we were never in any real danger; but we did not realize that the streams had risen so high. Brother Charles is staying on the other side of the town, and we did not see much of him for several days, though sometimes I would recognize him as a fellow-toiler in the river, building a dam, trying to save lives or a house, or something like that.

Oshu Kaido, a Leading Street of Tokyo, During the Floods

"Well, Berry and I immediately put on old clothes and started out in the storm. Of course, it wasn't worth while bothering with umbrellas or water-proofs. Some houses were in danger of being flooded, and we worked several hours, building dams, most of the time standing in the water. We carried many people to places of safety. We sent Mr. and Mrs. Chappell (of Aoyama) up to our house to stay. Then, after we had done all we could there, we went across town to where another branch of the river had risen very high. As we were looking across the stream, we saw it gradually eat away the bank and foundations under a big cottage belonging to a Congregational missionary, where my wife and I had stopped and taken afternoon tea a few days before. Soon the house toppled in and was washed down stream. Fortunately, the occupants had gotten everything movable out.

"Then we heard of a family, a little farther up on our side of the river, who were supposed to be in danger and we went there. We found the house apparently safe enough. Nothing had been removed. We went up through the bushes a little farther and saw that the river was eating away the bank very fast. One of us ran to find the owner of the house—a brand new building, erected last spring—while the other three ran in and began to get things out. It was a race with the river, but we got everything out, including even the windows and doors, and then we stood in the yard while the house toppled over and sailed off in the current. All this was in a terrible rain-fall which measured twenty inches in fourteen hours.

"We came home, changed our clothes, had some supper and went out again to get provisions. We carried a basket as big as a trunk, and bought all sorts of things—for it looked as if there would be a famine—groceries, fruit, vegetables. Then we went out again to help the refugees. Those I have mentioned were the only two foreign houses destroyed, but we had to work very hard to save some,

A SERMON ON BACKSLIDERS

An Unpublished Discourse by DWIGHT L. MOODY, America's Greatest Evangelist*

This is the seventh of twenty remarkable sermons by Moody, never before published, and the existence of which was disclosed only a few months ago. The absolute authenticity of the sermons is vouched for by the evangelist's son, Wm. R. Moody, who cordially approves their publication in this paper. The sermons are the exclusive property of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. One will appear each month.

WE have for our subject to-day "Backsliding." I want to tell the workers they can use the Bible to help the backsliders. If I was going to deal with a person, an individual that had backslidden, or thought he had backslidden, the first thing I would do would be to find out whether he has been converted or not. Some people unite with the church, thinking that is going to lead to their conversion, and find they haven't been converted, and in a few months they call themselves "backsliders." They are not backsliders at all. I don't want to deal with them as I would with a real backslider.

Dwight L. Moody

A real backslider is one who has been born of the Spirit, tasted heavenly things, and been drawn back into the world. And it is not necessary to be a public backslider to be classed as a backslider. If I should go out to-night into the company of unbelievers, and hear a good many things said against Jesus Christ, and not lift up my voice against it, and come home to-night to my evening worship and feel a leanness in my soul, I would find I had taken a step backwards, more or less. And I would need to confess it, and ask God to forgive me. If we are constantly stepping forward and backward, we are not gaining. But when we find that we are slipping backward, and losing our interest in the Bible, our interest in morning prayer, or evening prayer, or family worship, that's a sign of a decline.

The Book for Backsliders

I want now to call your attention to the Book of Jeremiah—that's the Book for Backsliders. The nation in the days of Isaiah and Jeremiah was declining; the nation was going over to other gods; they were serving the gods of the heathen nations about them, going over to idolatry, and yet God gave them one of the best men that ever trod the earth. I think you can count up on the ends of your fingers the Bible characters that he has not something recorded against. Jeremiah commenced when a young man to stand for God, and his star shone right on through his whole life. And God gave them that prophet that he might woo them back to himself. And I believe that the people of our own nation—and I know I shall be called a pessimist when I say it—I think that this nation has been declining and backsliding as a nation. When I read that we have had 3,000 murders in a year, and suicides are increasing, and strong drink is increasing, and divorces are increasing—twenty-five thousand people got divorced last year—I think there are signs of decay; and I think the time has come to call the nation back to God. We can't do any better, it seems to me, than to take the word that God gave that nation and apply it to ourselves.

I will read a few verses in the sixth chapter of Jeremiah, the fourteenth verse: "They have healed also the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, Peace, peace; when there is no peace." There can be no peace as long as there's hidden sin and not God's righteousness in the inward parts. There's no use talking about things going on prosperously when there's sin in the camp, an Achan in the camp. Joshua is going to be victorious.

"Were they ashamed when they had committed abomination? Nay; they were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush: therefore they shall fall among them that fall: at the time that I visit them they shall be cast down."

Now this is the verse that I want to call attention to: "Thus saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls. But they said, We will not walk therein."

Ask for the old paths! Some one brought this charge against me: that my theology was too old for the present day—100 years old. If it were not 6,000 years old, I'd throw it into the Gulf of Mexico. Clear back! Truth never grows old; is as young this morning as it has ever been. Talk of the old truths wearing out! Do you use the same reasoning about the sun, and it has been shining 6,000 years? "Worn out!" "Old paths!" What are we saying now? "We don't like the paths of our fathers; they were too puritanical." Hasn't this nation given up the Sabbath? Aren't our great cities turned into picnic goers every Sabbath in the summer? every train of cars chartered, and the boats on our rivers loaded down with excursionists on the Sabbath, and many churches emptied on the Sabbath? "Giving up the old paths!"

Now I would like to see a nation that has given up the Sabbath, that has not gone down the way the Jews went, Egypt and Rome and all those nations. I don't believe a nation can exist without righteousness, so long as there is a republican form of government where the vote is in the hands of the people.

National Backsliding

"Also, I set watchmen over you, saying, Hearken to the sound of the trumpet. But they said, We will not hearken." They would not hear Isaiah or Jeremiah; they would not hear the voice of God.

"Hear, O earth: behold, I will bring evil upon this people, even the fruit of their thoughts, because they have not hearkened unto my words, nor to my law, but rejected it." Rejected my law; I will reject them. Now you know what happened. You know how Nebuchadnezzar came down on the city and took Zedekiah, and slew his children, and dug his eyes out of his head, and took him down to Babylon, and threw him into prison—and there he died. What an awful thing that Jerusalem rebelled against God! Wherever a nation has gone against God, they have brought ruin against themselves.

In the second chapter of Jeremiah, and the fifth verse: "Thus saith the Lord." When God speaks, you and I ought to stop and listen. "What iniquity have your fathers found in me, that they are gone far from me, and have walked after vanity, and are become vain? Neither said they, Where is the Lord that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, that led us through the wilderness, through a land of deserts and of pits, through a land of drought, and of the shadow of death, through a land that no man passed through, and where no man dwelt? And I brought you into a plentiful country, to eat the fruit thereof, and the goodness thereof; but when ye entered, ye defiled my land, and made my heritage an abomination."

I believe this is the best land God ever gave to any nation, a land flowing with milk and honey, and it is a poor man's paradise. If he will let whisky and tobacco alone, he can have his own home. See the millions of money put into tobacco and whisky and then they complain about "hard times." What we want to have is a revival of righteousness, and we shall have "good times."

"Toning Down" the Commandments

I was talking with a man some time ago, a man high in the Church, and he said: "Of course we must not be too puritanical. When the Lord Jesus came, he toned down the Commandments." I said, Did he tone down the first? No, not that one. "Honor thy father and thy mother." Did he tone that down? No. It's too well toned down in this country now; pretty well toned down. Somebody has been toning it down. "Thou shalt not steal"? No. "Thou shalt not commit adultery"? No. And I kept on, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." And he said, "The Lord toned that down." Do you believe it? Do you believe the Lord picked out one of these Commandments and toned that down; so that he would turn the day of God into a day of recreation, and change it from an hallowed into an unholy day? Now I believe if a man will read the daily newspapers seven days in the week, there'll be a backslider. I don't believe you can read Sunday newspapers and keep your heart warm. The Bible for a good many Christians is the Sunday newspaper; and if the man reads it, and goes to church, Gabriel couldn't gain his attention. As it is, open a man's head, and you'll find it filled with everything gathered from all over the world.

Now you say you haven't backslidden. I want to know if the nation isn't going back? Where are they? Train after train is sent out on the Sabbath, to take out the Sunday papers. Young men had their games on Saturday, and the people want to go and find out on Sunday who beat—Harvard, Yale; so our young men will be buying the papers on Sunday, and reading them instead of reading the Bible and going to church. Let us get at facts. Isn't the nation declining? You call me a pessimist. Put me down as a pessimist if you want to. I am a good ways from being a pessimist. I believe the Son of God will sway his sceptre from the river to the ends of the earth. And if Israel did backslide, God took Israel down to Babylon, and since that time Israel has never turned away to idols. You can't find an idol among the Jews since the Captivity; God took that out of them. If we don't give God the Sabbath, he will take it. They were taken to Babylon 70 years. God told them to give the land rest; and 490 years they disobeyed that commandment. Seven times seventy equals 490. The land had rest and its Sabbath. If you don't give God your Sabbath, he will take it. Look at your men cut off at fifty! A business man, working seven days in the week! He is "cut off." I'm taking facts now. Jeremiah said, "My people have committed two evils: First, forsaken me." The moment we forsake God, we are ready for most anything that comes along. "They have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters; and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water."

Now, think! If there's a man or a woman in this audience to-day that's in a backslidden state, there's no one to blame but yourself. You'll blame the Church, the ministers, wife, husband, neighbors or some society; but there's no one to blame but yourself. Because you "have forsaken the Lord." When we are converted, we are not converted to the Church; we are not converted to the ministers; if we are truly converted we are converted to God and our first allegiance is to God. So, if we have left him it's our own fault, isn't it? And the only way for a person to backslide is to leave the Lord, and turn away from him. How many in this audience once had a family altar? And you let that altar go.

Individual Backsliders

You had not only family worship, but closet worship; used to go off alone, and felt you couldn't live without God. Do you have any such time now? Secret worship gone; family worship gone; Bible gone; the social prayer meeting of the church gone, and here you are to-day, in a cold, backslidden state, and find fault with the people. I never found a backslider in all my life that wasn't full of the faults of other people—talking against the Church and against ministers. If we keep our heart right, there'll be no trouble with the Church or ministers; it's the trouble with ourselves. If a man will treat Christ as he treats any other friend, he never would get very far away from him. Did you ever hear of a backslider bidding good-by to the Church of Christ, or to the Lord Jesus Christ? Did you ever hear of one going into his closet and saying good-by? Saying, "I have known you these ten years; your service is hard; you are a hard master; the world is better than you are; I come to bid you good-by. I'm going away; I'm going to leave you. Farewell, Lord Jesus." You never did hear that. Now you go into your closet, and say, "Lord, how shall I go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." But you ran off and left him. You were invited out to some party, and there were mean things said against Jesus, and you hadn't the courage to face them—and you are a disciple of Jesus! You were asked to take a drink, and didn't have the moral courage to face it, and yet you are a disciple. Yes, you are a backslider. You lost interest in the Church and in the Bible; and there you are to-day, in the poor, wretched, miserable state! Isn't that a fact? You've left God without a cause, and then you don't think God is the same to-day that he has been all the centuries! But he is unchangeable—the same gentle, tender, loving Christ. He wants to forgive you now and blot out all your backslidings, if you will come to him. God help you to-day to come.

I come now to another solemn verse: Jeremiah 2: 19. Read it: "Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee: know therefore and see that it is an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God." An evil and bitter thing! Now, I challenge any backslider to contradict that statement. Hasn't it been an evil and bitter thing that you've left the Lord? There are wives who have left the Lord on account of drunken husbands. You chose him rather than Christ. Some have left Jesus Christ and brought sorrow into their families. I've never seen a father and mother backsliders, both of them, whose children haven't gone to ruin.

In one of the large towns in England, there was a mother who said to me, "I don't want my son to be brought under the influence of this meeting." She was wealthy and ambitious for her child, and she said, "If my boy should get interested and go and join the Young Men's Christian Associati hey might have him out on the streets irculating tracts. I couldn't stand hat." And, to keep him away from he meetings, she arranged to be away luring the thirty days I was there. She was a member of the church, and ot classed as a backslider. The pas-or of that church stood at my right and, and never was absent. The hirty days passed, and the last day ame. Our farewell meeting was in he afternoon, and I was wondering hy the pastor wasn't there. He came ushing in, and pushed his way up to ne and said, "I'm sorry I didn't get ere before the meeting broke up; but was called to a very sad friend to-lay." And then he told about the nother and that only child, and her eeping him away from our meetings. And the pastor said, "To-day that nother has brought him back in his offin, and I have come from his rave; and the mother says she would ive all she had in the world to have im back." It is an evil thing and a itter to leave the Lord. Don't you eave him. There's no woman who can et on without this living Christ.

I was in St. Louis, trying to lead an ld white-haired backslider back into he kingdom of God. I worked and vorked, for a long time, trying to get im to come back. I took up this very erse. He said, "Did you say that's n the Bible? Read it again." I ead it slowly and carefully. "Thine wn wickedness shall correct thee, and hy backslidings shall reprove thee; now, therefore, and see that it is an vil thing and bitter that thou hast orsaken the Lord thy God, and that ny fear is not in thee, saith the Lord od of Hosts." And the old man ropped his head, and said, "That is rue. I've had a bitter time of it. 've had an evil time of it." But he ame back. About midnight the old nan wiped away his tears, and between leven and twelve o'clock he went way, and I thought rejoicingly. The ext night he was in front of me, and he poor fellow looked as if he hadn't friend on the earth. When we went nto the inquiry room, he followed me n, and I said, "What's the matter? What's the trouble?" He said, "This as been the most awful day of all my ife." "That's singular," I said. "I hought that God restored you the joy f his salvation last night." "I think e did. But," he says, "I've got four ons and daughters that are married, nd live in this city. I spent the day ith them. I didn't go to business. spent it in going to my sons and my aughters, and sons-in-law and daugh-ers-in-law, and I talked with them ersonally, and I didn't find one that idn't mock me and call me 'an old ool.' I led them into infidelity, and I an't lead them out."

"Thy backslidings shall reprove thee. t is an evil and bitter thing." O man, ome back! O woman, come back! It s a bitter thing. Ask God to forgive our backslidings. He wants to do it.

I wish you knew how my heart goes ut towards you. How I would like to ee this nation turning back to God! ut we must get back as individuals. et's come back to him to-day—this hole company.

When Grant lay in front of Rich-ond, there in the Wilderness, a father ame down to look after his boy, and e couldn't find what hospital he was n. That father was bound to find his oy, and he went into ward after ward, nd he would cry out, "John Thomp-on! Your father wants you!" And, t last, he went into a ward and cried ut, "John Thompson! Your father ants you!" And the wounded man fted his head and said, "Here I am, ather!" And he kissed him and issed him.

O backslider! God wants you this orning. Come home now. He loves ou, with an everlasting love, an un-ailing love, and he'll heal all your ackslidings if you'll turn to him.

NEW YEAR'S IN OCTOBER

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

NEW YEAR'S in October makes you sit up and think. If you think hard enough you can lean back and rest. You never heard of New Year's Day coming in October? January 1, you say, is New Year's Day. True it is that January 1 is our day, but we are not the only people in this world. The Jews are very much older than we are, and their New Year's Day will come on October 4. We date our New Year from the birth of Christ. The Jews date their New Year from the creation of the world. They believe that the world was created 3,760 years and three months before the birth of Christ.

ARE you interested in the Jews? With Paul can you say: "My heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is that they might be saved." Is it possible that any of you boys and girls have never prayed for the Jews? Let us look at some of the facts about their life, then see if we shall feel any more interested in them. First, the home life of the Jew. In the Jewish home more children are born and fewer die than among any other class of people. Every child is welcomed and loved. In the Jewish home the children honor their parents. As father and mother grow older they are treated like a king and queen. If you will visit the poor-house in your county or State you will not find a Jewish father or mother there. Jewish parents love their children and Jewish children love their parents. A Jew organized in New York the pure milk supply for babies. As a result the death rate among little children has dropped from ninety-six to sixty-three in every thousand. Second, the Jew in American history. A Jew gave the money to send Columbus on his voyage to America. Queen Isabella had pawned her jewels some months before and did not have any left to pawn for Columbus. Luis de Santangel furnished the money for Columbus. The map Columbus used was drawn by a Jew. One of his officers, his doctor and his interpreter, were Jews. The interpreter stood on American soil first.

IN the time of our Revolution three members of Washington's staff were Jews—Colonels Francks and Nones, and Major Noah. (Major Noah should have been put at the head of the navy.) A Jew gave Washington $658,000 to carry on the war and he never asked to have a dollar of it returned. In our Civil War the Jews were a great help, and in the Spanish-American War were many Jews. Some of them were with Colonel Roosevelt's Rough Riders.

After living in every country of the world the Jews selected America as their Promised Land. In 1654 they came to America and on April 25, 1665, they were given the legal right to make it their country. For 2,000 years they had been without a country and without a flag, but now when over eighteen million boys and girls stand in our public schools and say: "I pledge allegiance to our flag and to the Republic for which it stands," three hundred thousand of the little patriots are Jews. In New York City we have ten times as many Jews as there are in the Holy Land and thirty times as many as dwell in Jerusalem. In twenty-eight of our public schools were found 64,605 children, and of these 61,105 were Jews. Now, may I ask if you are interested in the Jews? Will you join with Paul and say: "My heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is that they might be saved."

IN a sermon by a Jew, he said: "We are sent to this land to be witnesses for God. Tell me not it was a chance that brought us here. It was the hand of God. We are here to preach the great ideal. God has given us rest. Our fathers passed through the fire, but our lines are laid in pleasant places." The Jew believes in God and has taught the world to believe in him. There was a time when the Jews hated our Christ, who came to the world as a Jew. Now they say he was the best man and the greatest preacher who ever lived. Some day they will all join with us in preaching Christ. The Bible teaches us that they are to be saved. Surely my boys and girls will join with Paul in his great prayer for the Jews.

About twenty years ago the New Testament was, for the first time, printed in Hebrew. So many of the Jews wanted to read about Jesus that 600,000 copies of a Hebrew New Testament were printed. It is believed that there are 250,000 Jewish Christians. Three thousand converted Jews are preaching the Gospel.

I WONDER if my Juniors know that one of the rhymes they often use in play came from the following quaint rhyme, which originated with the Jews:

> Then came the Holy One, blessed be he, and killed the angel of death, that killed the butcher, that slew the ox, that drank the water, that quenched the fire, that burned the staff, that beat the dog, that bit the cat, that ate the kid, that my father bought for two pieces of money—a kid, a kid!

The Jews called it the Haggadah and sang it at the "home service" of the Passover. By it they taught their children some great truths in their history. The father who bought the kid was Jehovah. The cat represented the Assyrians, the dog, the Babylonians, and the staff, the Persians. The ox was the Saracens who subdued Palestine. By the butcher was meant the Crusaders, who conquered the Saracens. By the Holy One they meant God, who would destroy their enemies and restore to them the Holy Land. In this rhyme the children learned their history and hope. America may be that Promised Land. Pray for the Jews.

God's Way

WHEN we think of God the Father,
Who for sinners gave His Son
To live and toil and suffer
For the glorious victory won;
While we marvel at the greatness
Of the love that can convey
Such unselfish thought and purpose,
Still we wonder at God's way.

As we look to Him for guidance,
Asking for the sun's bright glow
To disperse the darkening shadows,
Melt away the winter's snow;
As we search the lowering heavens,
Seeing only starlight's ray,
We rebel at this, the answer,
As we wonder at God's way.

When we tell Him all our yearnings,
Thinking He will find them good,
And will send to us the blessing
In the way we wish He would;
When we find His plans are diffcrent,
Not at all the things we pray,
Oh, 'tis then so hard to trust Him,
As we wonder at God's way.

If our prayers were always answered,
Many, many times we'd fall;
Thus we learn to know Him better,
For His way is best of all.
So, my friend, when doubts assail you,
And you know not how to pray,
Simply trust Him—learn to praise Him!
Wonderful will be God's way!

A Remarkable Family

JERE HIGHFILL, of Summerfield, Guilford County, N. C., was born July 7, 1826, and was married to Miss Minerva Moore, July 7, 1846. To them were born nineteen children, twelve girls and seven boys, of whom six boys and five girls are now living. These parents are also living, aged 79 and 84, respectively. To sum up, there are nineteen children (eleven living), fifty-nine grandchildren (thirty-four living now), and nineteen great-grandchildren (seventeen of them living). Fourteen of their children married, three died early, and two are not married. To this total of ninety-seven descendants must be added twelve step-children and one adopted daughter, a grand total of one hundred and nine persons. It should also be stated that there were five of the original children not married and that two others of the married ones have had no children. My mother in 1899 had her photograph taken together with the then five living generations, which photograph I have in my room. Among your readers is there another such family record, and if so, where? The oldest of these nineteen children is a minister and the youngest a teacher. W. L. MOORE.

Four Generations

MR. JOSEPH P. DELANO, of Warsaw, Va., has been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the last twenty years. He is 86 years and five months old. He has eight children living. He has seventy-four grandchildren and thirty-four great-grandchildren. A number of other members of the family are also subscribers. The Delano family is one of the oldest and best known in Warsaw, and has many members in all sections of the country.

The Results of the Recent Elections

ALREADY several States have passed through the heat of political campaigns while the heat of the fervid summer was still with us. So accustomed are people to having elections in November that it strikes a large majority of our citizens oddly when they hear that the first skirmishes in the political arena to decide Gubernatorial and Congressional aspirations have been fought and won. Two New England States have had spirited contests, and elected their Governors and Congressmen while the politicians in other States watched for the results with interest as a possible prophecy of the way things might go later in their own districts.

Vermont went Republican by about fifteen thousand, while Maine, for the first time since 1880, elected a Democratic Governor by a majority of over six thousand. Hon. Frederick W. Plaistead, Mayor of Augusta, was the successful candidate. It is an interesting fact that Mr. Plaistead is the son of the last Democratic Governor of Maine, Hon. Harris Plaisted, who was elected by the fusion of the Democrats and "Greenbackers." Mayor Plaistead's opponent was the present Governor, Hon. Bert M. Fernald, of Poland.

There were a number of local issues which differentiated the Maine campaign from those carried on in other parts of the country. Of course national issues were discussed by the nominees and speakers for both parties, as there were four Congressmen to be elected, but the most important of the local questions was the liquor question. Maine has long had a clause in her constitution prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, and several attempts have been made in recent years to get the question resubmitted to the voters, but thus far the efforts of those who desired a constitutional change have been fruitless. In the Democratic platform it was strongly urged that the whole question whether the State should have prohibition in its constitution should be again voted upon by the new generation in politics. The Sturgis law was also an object of attack. This law allows the Governor to send deputies into any county where he thinks the sheriffs are remiss in enforcing the liquor law. A recent legislature voted to repeal the law, but Governor Fernald vetoed it and the Sturgis law remained upon the statute books. It is said that thousands of votes were cast to influence this issue alone.

John A. Mead
Elected Governor of Vermont

F. W. Plaisted
Elected Governor of Maine

Governor-elect Plaistead is a native of Bangor. He was educated in his own State and at St. Johnsbury Academy in Vermont. As soon as his school days were over he started in newspaper work at Presque Isle, Me. Later he came to Augusta and became manager of a paper called the New Age, in which his father had a large interest. He bought out his father's partner and soon became his father's successor as owner and editor. He has long been actively interested in politics. He was elected sheriff in 1906 and was nominated for Congress in 1897 and 1898, but was defeated both times. He was more successful in municipal politics, and was elected mayor of Augusta in 1906 and re-elected in 1907 and 1908. The next year he was defeated, but came back to the mayor's office this year. In the present State election he carried his home city by 330 votes. He has been a delegate to a number of Democratic national conventions, has been chairman of one of the State Democratic conventions, and has held other posts of responsibility in the gift of his party. He is very prominent in Masonic circles, having been Grand Commander of the Commandery of Maine. He is also a Past Exalted Ruler of the order of Elks.

The Republicans elected two Congressmen, one of them being Hon. Asher Hinds of Portland, present parliamentary clerk in the House of Representatives at Washington, and the Democrats elected two. The Democrats have probably a majority in the State Senate, and it seems likely that a Democrat will be elected to fill the post now filled by Senator Hale. Senator Hale announced last spring that he did not care to run again, but wished to retire to private life. He has served his State as one of its representatives at Washington for over a quarter of a century. Many names have been suggested, and there will apparently be no dearth of candidates, but it is too early yet to name any one as the leader in the race for the much-coveted honor.

In Vermont Dr. John A. Mead of Rutland, the present Republican Lieutenant-Governor, was elected Governor by a majority of over fifteen thousand. His opponent was Charles D. Watson, of St. Albans. The entire Republican ticket was elected. The two Republican Congressmen were elected and the legislature is also Republican, thus making certain the re-election to the Senate of Hon. Carroll S. Page.

On September 12 the voters of Arizona voted on candidates for the coming constitutional convention. The campaign was fought with great bitterness, politicians of the different parties bolting their party tickets. The issue was the referendum and initiative. The result stood: Democrats thirty-five, Republicans twelve, Labor-ites five.

The Burned Districts of the Northwest

IT will take several generations to make good the extensive damage done to the forests in Washington, Idaho, Montana, and other States in the Northwest by the recent forest fires. Even now the woods are on fire in places and the people will not feel safe until winter sets in. The area burned over is equal to some of our smaller States. Wallace, Idaho, of which we print some recent photographs, was in danger of being entirely swept off the map. The fire was stopped in the town itself. On one side rise the blackened ruins of homes and stores, and on the other the smoke-blackened but still intact walls of what will be the beginning of the new town of Wallace, for the people are determined that the fire shall be regarded as a setback only. The town of Taft was practically swept out of existence.

It is thought that at least two hundred people lost their lives, while hundreds of others had almost miraculous escapes from death. Some immersed themselves in rivers and lakes, while one party found safety in an abandoned mine just as they were about ready to give up hope.

One man who traveled over part of the burned territory as soon as the fires had subsided sufficiently to make his passage possible gives a vivid account of what he saw. He said that the blackened stumps were still crackling, showing a glow of red here and there, while underneath he walked in white wood ashes into which his foot often slipped until he stood in it half way to the knee. As far as the eye could reach was an appalling scene of desolation—a black and gray landscape under a pall of smoke. The loss of life among the wild creatures of the forest cannot be even estimated. It included without doubt almost every bird and four-footed creature within the burned areas, for in most cases the fire came in such a way that all chance of escape was cut off. He found the bones of deer and bear and of other animals. The heat had affected the streams to such a degree that large trout were found floating dead on the surface of ponds and streams. Probably at no time in the memory of living men has there been such widespread destruction of timber and animal life.

The foresters, aided by the people of their districts, are making strenuous efforts to prevent another outbreak of the flames, and all people living in forest districts should carefully observe the regulations provided for their own protection.

India's Grateful Famine Children

By ADA LEE, Calcutta, India

THIS has been a year of great unrest among the people of India. Yet we have worked on in peace and quiet undisturbed, protected by our ther's sheltering care. We rejoice greatly in ing the new building completed for which we have rked and prayed so long. This is the memorial our six children taken home from Darjeeling. It wonderful how the Lord has supplied the money and guided us in planning it. This gives a me, with class, prayer and work rooms, for ee hundred girls. It also furnishes us and five ly missionaries a comfortable home, ich to me is one of the most essen- l things in a missionary's life in h a climate as India.

During the sad famine time, we thered great numbers of children m the fields of suffering and have r since been fitting them in educa- n and Christian training for God's rk in some mission field, or for ristian citizenship in this great d. Many readers of THE CHRIS- AN HERALD have aided us in this rk by their constant prayers and eral contributions. The famine chil- en are growing up to young man- od and womanhood. I send you a otograph of a group of them signing vote of thanks to THE CHRISTIAN RALD and its readers who helped m. We care now for 210 destitute ls and 50 boys. Our work is run the lines of the late George Mueller Bristol, England. Our rice pot has to k one hundred and ninety pounds of e daily, and He provides. This year ven bright girls go up for the gov- ernment examination for teachers' certificates, and we have a most promising lot of girls coming on in the middle standards. In our boys' orphanage, we have some very promising boys. Some of the other ones have gone to learn trades this year, and two or three have gone into mission work, preaching on the street and in the villages.

Our Bible women are working faithfully and the seed is being sown broadcast among the women in the zenanas and villages. Not long ago we went to a large native town in a canal boat in which we slept, cooked and ate. We arrived late in the evening. Our Bible women went to the bazar (market), where the people, men, women and children, swarmed like bees. Many of them had never seen a white face or any one dressed in English clothes. You can imagine the excitement when we appeared on the scene. Some ran away in fright. Curiosity, however, overcame their fears, and they soon returned. Among the children was a beautiful little girl. Some boys had told them I had come to take them away from their homes and she screamed in terror. I called to her and began to talk to her in a kindly way; still she hung back till I pulled out of my bag a beautiful card—a picture of the Good Shepherd leading forth his sheep—and told her the story. Finally I gave her the picture and she went away happy. This was a Sunday School picture card some one had sent us from America. Next day, we found that the little girl had shown the picture to every one, and the children had spread the news and told of the white woman who had given the little girl the picture card, and how she loved little children. So this little picture won the children and opened up the homes and the hearts of the people, and we found a welcome and a hearing wherever we went.

Your kind letter of the 18th of June last came duly to hand, enclosing draft for furtherance of our orphanage work. Please accept our heartiest thanks for this kind remembrance.

News of the Missionary Movement

The "Mother of Missions" Celebrates

BOSTON will witness in October a truly great celebration. A hundred years ago was organized the American Board of Commissioners r Foreign Missions. It has proved eminently rthy of leadership. Forty-five other societies ve since followed it into the field which is the rld.

Following is a brief programme for the three days' ebration. Simultaneous meetings will be held in ee halls each evening. The first session, Tuesday, tober 11, two o'clock P.M., will be opened by a votional service, followed by business. The annual dress will be delivered by the president, Samuel Capen, of New York. Tuesday evening, at eight lock, in Tremont Temple, the speakers will be esident Henry C. King of Oberlin, and Dr. R. E. eer of the Presbyterian Foreign Board; in Park reet Church, Dr. J. P. Jones of India and Dr. thur H. Smith of China; in Old South Church, . Smith and Dr. Shepherd of Turkey.

Wednesday, October 12, the entire day will be voted to a historical pilgrimage to Andover and adford. It was at Andover that the first foreign ssionaries from America received their training r the ministry. There, too, were formed the first uns looking to the organization of a foreign mis- nary society. An appropriate tablet will be dicated in Andover on the spot where the first ssionaries met for consultation and prayer.

Wednesday evening in Tremont Temple, the eakers will be Dr. John R. Mott and Dr. Charles Jefferson of New York; in Old South church, esident King and Dr. R. E. Speer; in Park Street urch there will be ten-minute addresses from teran missionaries and others. Thursday morn- g there will be five-minute addresses by mission- es. Thursday evening Dr. Wardlaw Thompson ll voice the sentiments of all in a speech at the se. On the same evening meetings will be held Park Street church and the Old South church. iday will be marked by a farewell service for new ssionaries.

The American Board is carrying out, during the rrent year, a programme of advance on broad es. This includes the raising of $560,000 from ividuals, churches, Sunday Schools and Christian deavor societies and $300,000 by the three oman's Boards. It is proposed to wipe out the t of 2,450 churches which made no contributions foreign missions last year. J. PHILLIPS.

India's Great Bathing Festival

EVERY twelve years the great Mahamakam festival is celebrated by Hindus of all castes in the sacred city of Kumbakonam, Madras. ere are two festivals, lasting ten days, the closing day being the most important in a ceremonial sense, as on that day they bathe in the holy waters.

For centuries it has been the belief of these Hindus that, by bathing in the great Mahamakam tank (into which the nine "holy" rivers of the world are believed to pour their waters on this day), they can save themselves from all sins and secure salvation in the future.

Great throngs attend these ceremonies, crowded trains arriving every hour at the place of worship. The order of bathing is first in the Mahamakam tank, then in the Porramari tank, and lastly in the river Kanori. Before bathing, all the people initiate themselves by uttering the Sangalpa Manthram, by calling the day of the week, the star of the day, and other combinations of the heavens peculiar to that day. Most of the people wait until the gods go in to give the sacred waters; then they bathe, and then drink of the holy water, compounded of milk, butter and other substances from the cow, which they hold highly sacred. Before bathing, the women offer sorrel, red powder, turmeric flowers, nuts, gold and silver pieces, bangles of dark glass, betel leaves, and other gifts to two goddesses, one the goddess of the Ganges.

The people then crowd to the temples to make offerings, get themselves absolutely pure from all sins and receive blessings, the gods having been taken back to their respective temples during the night.

Crowds at the Bathing Tanks

Neglected Village Children of Syria

IT IS now more than fifty years since evangelistic preaching was begun by the American Board in Kessab, Syria. For more than thirty years, the church—with a congregation of 1,800, the third in size in the Central Turkey Cilician Union—has been self-supporting. The pastor's salary has been thirty-three liras Turkish ($145.20). During this time, the people have had a great many opportunities to understand the principles of the Gospel, but the schools were not developed until within recent years. Consequently the young men of Kessab have remained in a backward and ignorant state. To-day, not counting those in the outside villages, there are in the village of Kessab alone about four hundred young men and women who scarcely know how to read or write a letter.

These young people, if they are girls, sit idly in their homes and gossip, and if young men, they go to the coast, to Latakia, or Scanderoon, to be porters (the lowest kind of work in Turkey), or they roam idly around the mountains in the region of Kessab, spending their time in doing nothing. There is no work for them here, so what can they do? But this state of things, this burden-bearing and idleness and mingling with low society, is both mentally and morally sapping the young life of our church, because the unwholesome and harmful moral atmosphere of Scanderoon leads our young men down to death, and the lack of mental and moral training unfits our girls for the making of homes and the training of children.

For two years this has been the subject of earnest conversation; but now we have reached the conclusion that to help the young people of Kessab we must have better schools and give them better education and training. For the boys in the schools, we are doing all we can to develop and train them. We have also opened a night school for young men and boys, who can not study in the day school, and a good number attended last year. We are hoping for a larger attendance this year. We have long felt the need of a good reading-room, but the condition of the country politically did not encourage us to make the attempt. Now, however, as a thank-offering for the blessing of constitutional freedom that has come to us so recently, we are trying to open one. We are accepting donations of money or books from all who wish to aid in this cause. Many cannot read English, but a few can, and all of the people here enjoy the illustrations in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

I hope your people will do what they can for us in our work of helping these very deserving people in this missionary land.

MISS E. M. CHAMBERS.

The Protection of the Panama Canal

WITH the Panama Canal two-thirds of the way towards completion, it seems an odd time for some Americans to suddenly bring up the question whether the United States, the country which secured the use of the canal zone by treaty and is building the canal, should have the right to construct sufficient fortifications for its protection. Several foreign nations, whose interests in the matter are entirely selfish, are objecting to the United States preparing adequate defense, and our representatives to the Interparliamentary Congress at Brussels have unfortunately played into their hands, they showing an astonishing lack of accurate information when they said that by the treaty with Great Britain, the United States agreed to leave the canal unprotected by fortifications. Evidently the delegates were under the impression that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was ratified by this Congress, instead of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The first-named treaty would have prevented us from taking any steps to defend the canal and would have left it to be the easy spoil of the first invader, even though it had been no more a personage than Zelaya or one of his type. The great defect in the treaty was fortunately seen in time and the treaty was rejected. In its place the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, which left the United States free to protect the canal as it sees fit. It is unfortunate that the contrary impression was given at the Brussels Congress.

To insist that the canal be fortified is not urging militarism; it is just plain common sense. To build the canal and not protect it adequately would be as sensible as building a house and then publicly pledging one's self to leave off the front and back doors.

The United States, by holding the canal, protecting it when and where necessary, will do more toward making it of use to all nations than by leaving it as an unprotected prize in the international grab bag, and we would not be compelled to have such a large naval force, as the ships could be moved easily from coast to coast as needed. We believe in peaceful methods of settling disputes, but it seems as if the canal would be less likely to be a bone of contention if we protect it, so that Powers who covet the waterway would find it a difficult piece of our property to appropriate. In fact, they will leave it alone if it is protected as it should be, so that it can be kept a free and open waterway at all times under it sole owner, the United States of America.

That Letter Home

WHEN the postman passes the door morning by morning and does not stop; when on the country road the mail-driver leaves nothing in the box that is fastened to its post and is the connecting link between the rural household and the outside world, somebody's heart is disappointed. That somebody is very likely mother. She is going about the kitchen, stepping from the pantry to the table and from the table to the range just as she used to do when her boy and her girl were her children at home. There are plants in the window—mother could always make house-plants flourish; she had the secret of coaxing them to bud and flower. The cat is purring on the hearthstone. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is on the shelf under the clock, and father will take it down and read it to mother this evening, when she begins her usual task of knitting gray wool into warm socks for a son who is busy in a counting-house a good many miles down the river in a big city that mother sees, it may be, once in ten years. That boy's feet must be kept warm, and from time to time he receives a box at his boarding house in which there are the socks of mother's knitting, the undershirts that she has always fashioned for him, other tokens that remind him of home and very likely certain dainties, such as a roast chicken, a fruit cake, apples and nuts that no city larder known to him ever affords. Blessings on those boxes that thoughtful mothers send from home to their boys. The girl away from home, earning bread in the city in office or department store, is less likely than her brother or cousin to postpone too long that letter home which is so eagerly watched for. Her Sunday afternoons are not complete until the letter is written and carefully posted. But the boy considers himself no correspondent and thinks he is doing pretty well if, once a fortnight or once a month, he writes to the home people. Meanwhile, they are not being treated fairly. The years of self-denying love that are back of the boy's present foothold in business have earned for the old parents a better reward than to be side-tracked, while newer faces and newer interests monopolize his time and thought. Be fair to the old folks, young man, and write that letter home, the one you meant to write a week ago, before another day is gone.

Foolish War Scares

IT would seem to be inevitable that every country must have its periodical war scare. We can recall the widespread agitation, before our break with Spain, over the anticipated arrival of the Spanish fleet, which was said to be invincible. Many years earlier, we had no little trepidation regarding the possibility of a Chilean naval invasion. England is just now going through a pretty general war scare. The whole nation seems to be keyed up in anticipation of some sudden movement by Germany, and the nightmare rides the harder since Britons heard that the standing toast at German naval and military banquets is "the great day"—the day of invasion. Outsiders can see no reason for the scare. Germany does not seem to have any designs beyond a campaign of sharp trade competition. England, with her big fleet and her colonies and with France, Italy and Japan as allies, would appear to have little reason for apprehension. Germany, it is true, could put a tremendous force in the field and might make French soil the scene of the first operations; but a victory over France would be barren, unless it could be pushed further and over sea. Japan, too, if we may judge from the tone of some of its journals, is touched with the same popular jingo-mania and seems to be constantly dreaming of a threatened conquest of the Orient by some ambitious Western Power. All these various international perturbations will probably dissolve into thin air. Japan has been our friend for half a century and we have reciprocated the friendship. Neither has broken faith, nor is it likely to do so. Germany is looking for trade expansion, and the German people have no direct quarrel with the British, although the sensitiveness of Britain makes it unduly susceptible to events that possess little significance in themselves. What a glorious thing it would be if some power—Germany, England or Uncle Sam—were to take the initiative and bring all the standing causes of difference, real or imaginary, before The Hague Court, to be disposed of in a sensible, businesslike way!

As Others View Us

ONE of the most distinguished visitors among those who have come to this country to attend the International Prison Congress in Washington, is Professor Adolphe Prins of Belgium. He has control of the prisons in the Belgian capital and is a man of wide experience in all questions that relate to criminology. Professor Prins has made a study of New York and visited its jails and reformatories; he went up and down through the great East Side, with its vast cosmopolitan population, and he investigated the methods of the charity organizations of the big metropolis. He finds us the most generous people in the world. "Your rich are very rich," he says, "but they are more and more realizing that their wealth is only a stewardship. The State seems to do little for the poor; but the owners of individual fortunes plan out great benevolences that are national in their scope, and their results are astounding. Besides, you have a wonderful way of helping the poor to help themselves—you teach them how to prosper by their own efforts. . . . You are afraid, however, to hurt your criminals. You would rather coddle them. Your laws are to blame. You are too prone to arrest people and then too prone to let them go." This is an honest criticism from a friendly source. It is true that our States and municipalities do little for the poor and unemployed. Especially does this apply to our larger cities. Were the system of public works less under the control of politics, it might result in gre benefit to the temporarily unemployed. That o wealthy men are coming more and more to rega their riches as a stewardship is obvious to any i telligent observer, and it is a fortunate thing th their surplus should choose so beneficent an outl Yet the fact remains that the great national volun of charity comes not from the pockets of the ric but most largely from the large sympathetic cla of thrifty and industrious Americans who, havi themselves felt the need of friendly aid at times, a quick to respond to the call of those in need.

It is their example that has given to the worl in a newer and stronger interpretation, the gre lesson that all wealth is a trust, for the use which we are responsible to the divine Giver.

Training That Tells

LETTERS are frequently received from corr spondents, anxiously inquiring by what mea they may earn money at home. Sometimes the letters come from young women, who would like leave their country homes and secure remunerati employment in town. Not every one is so frank a she who candidly wrote, saying that what she w in search of was a place where she could have "t shortest hours and the easiest work, with the bigge salary." But very many altogether omit from the thoughts the imperative need of training. The fancy that their quickness, or their good looks, their pleasant manners, will carry them through t difficulties of beginning.

In the field of literature, numbers of women ima ine that they are well fitted to win golden gains only they can find a periodical or a publisher w will accept and pay for their stories, poems an essays. They confidently submit their unskille work and grieve when it is declined, quite obliviou of the fact that here, as elsewhere, training tells t the advantage of the author, and that without it th novice, meeting many competitors, is often for doomed to disappointment. In every professio every trade, every line that commands money, goo work is entitled to a good wage. Physician, nurs minister, telegraph operator, electrician, eng neer, motorman, conductor, maid-of-all-work, artis teacher, musician, shoemaker, each must have trai ing to succeed in doing special work with credit an success. The raw recruit has the same number o inches, the same breadth of chest and measuremen of girth that the well-drilled soldier has, but th two are in the greatest contrast, the one movin with precision, erectness and rapidity, the othe going through his exercises with jerkiness, awk wardness and slowness. It is training that tells.

Mayor Gaynor and His Family

THE first photograph of Mayor Gaynor of New York since his return from the hospital was taken September 10, at the Smithtown Horse how on Long Island, where the Mayor exhibited veral of his horses, some of which took premiums. he picture group includes Mayor and Mrs. Gaynor, rs. H. Vingut, a married daughter, and Norman, elen and Gertrude Gaynor. When the Mayor peared on the beautiful fifty-acre field of the fair- round with his wife and other members of the mily, friends flocked from every side about his g limousine car, to shake hands with him and press their pleasure at his appearance and pros- ct of complete recovery. The events of the day ade the Mayor very proud. His son Rufus in the orning won a blue ribbon with his father's horse esta, which was entered in the station wagon class r single horses. Miss Gertrude Gaynor took the ue ribbon with her favorite horse "Lemons" in the ass for best saddle horses, and Miss Marion aynor added further lustre to the day by winning r "Bobs" the first prize in the pony class. Miss ertrude also won the second prize in class 4 and ird prize in class 8. It was a gala day for the aynors at the horse show. eighed the Earth

The speed and schedule time the stars have been ascer- ined; the circumference and ameter of the earth have been termined. Professor Wetzel, the department of physics the College of the City of ew York, has just finished series of experiments by hich he has computed the eight of the earth to be 7,000,- 0,000,000 tons. The profes- r's apparatus is so extremely licate that the experiments d to be carried on entirely ter midnight to avoid even e jarring footfalls in the col- e corridor. The apparatus as put on public exhibition in e main building of the college the day of the opening. We all have to take the statement of the professor on ith. But whether he has ascertained the exact eight or not there is One who knows to the atom e size and to a millionth part of a grain the weight this planet on which we live. The prophet gives is minute detail of God's knowledge of the material alm as a reason why he will care so tenderly for ose who belong to him.

Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and ted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and hills in a balance? (Isa. 40 : 12.)

esident Taft and Young Men

President Taft laid the cornerstone of the Young en's Christian Association building at Beverly, ass., the other day. The President worked hard ysically in getting the big block of granite, three four feet, in place, and in spreading the mortar th the silver trowel. Among other things in his dress he said: "It is a great pleasure for me to ke part in the ceremony of dedicating a building at I believe sincerely will contribute greatly to the mfort, the welfare and the building up of good aracter in the young men of Beverly. I do not ow how it happened, but it has fallen to my lot to ke part in the dedication of buildings like this the rld over. I began in Dayton, O.; I went on to naha, and then to Seattle, and then to Shanghai, d then to Hong Kong, and then to Manila, and w I have swung around to Beverly; and it is an idence of the universal usefulness of the Young en's Christian Association that it is adapted, and ll adapted, to the betterment of so different com- unities as those that I have mentioned. It serves a great many purposes, but the one that impresses me as the most useful is the furnishing of a Christian club to young men at a time when the devil is very near and will get them if he can. It is in their idle moments that they contract the habits that lead them downward, and it is in their leisure that they can make their character what it ought to be, and under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association numbers of young men who would go down into the gutter are not rescued from there, but are kept from there and led onward and upward to become the best members of the community." Such a tribute from the head of the nation to an institution which has done so much for the physical, intellectual, social, moral and religious interests of young men is as beautiful as it is just. The development of young manhood by Christian environment and tuition and the purification of the individual heart by present faith in a present Saviour have marked the work of the Young Men's Christian Association throughout the country and world.

Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? by taking heed thereto according to thy word. (Ps. 119:9.)

Mayor Gaynor and His Wife and Children at a Long Island Outing

Disfigured for Life

Ten students were being initiated into the Alpha Debating Society of the York, Pa., high school, when a black oil, containing dye and acid, used in coloring leather, was smeared upon their faces. The acid ate into the faces, and the dye colored them black, and the physicians say that all ten will be disfigured for life—that the stain can never be taken out. The hazers only meant fun, as all hazers do, but there is often an element of danger which the hazers do not avoid, which maims and even destroys life. Moral injuries are done to our fellow-men by carelessness, which may damage them for this life and the next. Some careless or reckless thought or action, without any intention to do harm, permanently scars and stains the soul. What caution and circumspection there should be in character and conduct as we remember that for the careless as well as the intentional injuries we inflict we shall have to render so strict an account!

But I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. (Matt. 12:36.)

Man-Eating Lions

Theodore Roosevelt on his recent Western tour, while at Kansas City, Mo., addressed the students of the Westport High School, telling stories of his trip to Africa. He told the following stories of man-eating lions: "When they were building the railroad," he said, "construction was stopped for two weeks, because two lions had established themselves on the tracks and ate up all the men who came to work. I think they ate about one hundred. Finally they were killed." He said the survivor of another encounter with the lions told him a story which he would repeat. "At one railroad station," he began, "the lion ate up the agent, and when the next train came along it ate up a brakeman. The division superintendent, an Englishman, took a German and an Italian with him and went out there to kill the lion. They sat up in the night waiting for the lion, and finally the Italian went to sleep at one end of the car, and the German got into one of the berths. The Englishman sat at the window, with his rifle, on guard. He evidently went to sleep there. The lion, with its queer, sinister intelligence, saw that the man was asleep. It came up on the platform, pulled the sliding door open with its paw and went in. The German was awakened by the weight of the lion's hind legs on him. The forelegs of the lion were on the Englishman and the lion had the man's head in its mouth. The German shouted and awakened the Italian, who leaped up and jumped on the lion's back. He jumped off again and ran to the other end of the car. The lion had its man and only wanted to get away with him. It smashed its way through a window, dragging the Englishman with it, and all through the night the German and the Italian could hear the dreadful purring of the lion as it ate the Englishman." Fierce animal appetites within and beastly temptations without pounce upon and destroy the character and soul. A strong faith and a warm love are the only protection against them. Colonel Roosevelt in his lion stories surprised not only the pupils but their teachers when he referred to the description in the Bible of the man-eating lions which at one time devastated Samaria. It is said that Governor Hadley, who was on the platform at the time, remarked to his neighbor that he had never discovered that passage. If the Governor had re-read a portion of II. Kings he would have found this statement of some of the inhabitants of Samaria:

And so it was at the beginning of their dwelling there, that they feared not the Lord: therefore the Lord sent lions among them, which slew some of them. (II. Kings 17 : 25.)

Saved by His Wife

Mr. and Mrs. James Barth were picking elderberries on the edge of Jamaica Bay, Long Island, when Mr. Barth, who had been standing some time by a heavily laden bush, found himself sinking below his ankles in the mud. Every effort to extricate himself only sent him deeper in the mire. He was in dangerous quicksand, of which he had no warning. He had gotten up to his knees in the bog before he called to his wife in distress. He warned her not to come near him. He said, however, that if he could only reach the limb of a tree about six feet above him, and a little distance from him, he could extricate himself. The quick-witted wife went to the trunk of the tree, about twenty feet away, and climbed up to the branch of which her husband had spoken. She worked her way out to the end with her hands, supporting her weight until she got near to where her husband was. He could not quite reach her, and so she swung backward and forward a number of times, until he could catch her ankles; and then the man, who weighed two hundred pounds, worked his way up by clinging to his wife until he caught her about the waist, and by a desperate struggle extricated himself from what in a little time would have been a slimy grave. The woman was not large nor apparently overstrong, and yet knowing that the life of her husband depended upon her physical strength she clung to the branch and exerted almost superhuman energy in rescuing her husband. They worked their way back on the limb to safer ground, when the wife, worn out with the exertion and nervous strain from the shock, fell fainting to the ground. Her husband picked her up and carried her a mile to the trolley car, which they took for their home in Jamaica. A physician was summoned, who said that she would be confined to her bed with the prostration, but that no serious results would follow to the husband or wife. Women have always helped their husbands out of trouble. Since the Church began, Christian wives, by their prayers and lives, have been instrumental in God's hands in lifting their husbands out of the quicksands of temptation and moral evil. Rescue from the deadly mire of sin is mentioned by the psalmist:

He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings. (Ps. 40:2.)

MOST travelers who visit the Holy Land c. tent themselves with a visit to that restric l part west of Jordan. The mountainous gions of Moab as seen by them from Jerusalem lost in the purple haze that constantly hangs o them, and the great stretches beyond are covered mystery. This is true partly because of the fe historical incidents connected with the east regions, but mainly on account of the great ab of the Jordan valley that has always acted as barrier. Few who descend into the valley 1,5 feet below sea level undertake to climb the h beyond, which rise to a height of 3,000 feet. Thou its glory is far outshone by that of western Pal tine, still, both in the old and the new dispensatio it has a history of its own and from an econor standpoint will always enter very largely into life of Palestine.

Although not an integral part, it was the front land of Palestine and was the first conquered a first lost by the hosts of Israel. From these h Abraham first saw the Holy Land; it was here, the brook Jabbok, that Jacob wrestled with angel ere he entered into possession of the la that God would give him, and it was from th Pisgah heights that Moses viewed the promi land after he had finished his leadership of fo years through the wilderness.

The most striking thing about it has always b its isolation. However much connected by race a vicinity with their western kinsmen, the dwellers eastern Palestine have always been distinct, a their lands have never been occupied by the nati on the west except through acts of aggression a conquest. The Amorite chiefs, Og and Sihon, est lished themselves on the acclivities of these heigh but only to be themselves dislodged by the Israelit the Amorite kings of Palestine proper not striki a blow in behalf of their trans-Jordanic brethr The Israelite tribes who settled here exercised most no influence over their countrymen on t western bank, were carried into captivity lo before them and were succeeded by settlers not Jewish, but of Gentile origin. Even to-day t isolation is still felt. In giving an idea of th knowledge of present-day geography one of th remarked, "There are only four seas in the wor two of which are the Dead Sea and the Sea Galilee." Both of these are in sight of their o hills.

But the thing of most interest is its fertility. has always been the forest land and the past land of Palestine. The smooth hills received special name, expressive of their contrast with t rough and rocky soil of the west. The "oaks Bashan," which still fill the traveler with admi tion, were to the prophets and psalmists of Isr the chief glory of the vegetation of their comm country. The vast herds of wild cattle which th wandered through the woods were at once the ter and pride of the Israelites—the fat bulls of Basha The king of Moab was but a great sheep master a "rendered for tribute a hundred thousand lambs a a hundred thousand rams with the wool." Still t countless flocks may be seen; droves of cattle mo ing on like troops of soldiers, descending at suns to drink of the springs, literally in the language the prophet, "rams and lambs, and goats and b locks, all of them fatlings of Bashan."

It is striking to remember that, with this land their possession, the Israelites nevertheless press forward across the Jordan Valley and settled in t rugged mountains of Judah and Ephraim, never return to those beautiful regions which had be their first home in the Promised Land. "The Lo had made them ride on the high places of the ear that they might eat the increase of the fields; a he had made them to suck honey out of the cli and oil out of the flinty rock; butter of kine a milk of sheep; with fat of lambs and rams of t breed of Bashan and goats; with the fat of t kidneys of wheat and the pure blood of the grape

The Territory First Conquered and First Lost by the Warlike Hosts of Israel

Thus spoke the prophet leader, while they were still in enjoyment of this rich country. Yet forward they went. It was God's wise plan that they should not become engrossed in the lower pursuits of a worldly and commercial life. Theirs was a higher calling. Though the regions to which they advanced were less fertile, yet it was only there, shut in from the temptations to pursue wealth, that they could become God's peculiar people.

Of the tribes of Israel only two and a part of a third settled in this land. From first to last, they alone of the tribes never emerged from the state of their patriarchial ancestors. When Joshua bade them return to their possessions, it was not to their "houses," but to their "tents." In the national development of Israel we hear almost nothing of them. With the exception of two of their heroes, Elijah and Jephthah, their names are only mentioned in connection with the multiplication of their cattle, their wars with the Bedouin sons of Hagar and their spoils of camel and sheep. Reuben vanishes away into a mere Arabian tribe. There is one touching interest with which this land beyond the Jordan is invested.

It was the land of exiles. One place there was in its beautiful uplands consecrated by the presence of God in primeval times. Mahanaim marked the spot where Jacob saw the vision of the angels. To this scene of the great crisis in their ancestor's life the thought of his descendants returned in after years whenever foreign conquest or civil strife drove them from their native hills. Here Abner rallied the Israelites around Ishbosheth after the rout of Gilboa; here David fled when about to be dethroned by his son Absalom. The refuge which these hills afforded to David they also afforded to David's greater Son.

Perea, as it was called by the Greek, still occupied the same relation, secluded and retired from the busy world which filled the neighborhood of Jerusalem and the sea of Galilee. Thither our Lord probably retired after his baptism and thither also he came in the interval of danger which immediately preceded the end of his earthly life.

It has only been within recent years that these regions have heard of the message of the Cross. The old barriers are being broken down, and schools and churches are being established. Let us hope that they may yet enter more fully into the inheritance that has been prepared for all the children of God and that the few remaining barriers may be broken down as the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord.

General Notes

—Ex-President Roosevelt usually proves equal to a sudden emergency, as was shown by an incident which took place during his recent visit to Fargo, N. D. Mr. Roosevelt had just finished a Labor Day speech, when a man in the audience jumped up, and in a rude way thrust a question at the orator, asking who paid the expenses of his trip. Colonel Roosevelt replied that it was being paid by his publication, whereupon the man assumed an offensive attitude and said it was a lie. The ex-President stepped forward swiftly, grasped the fellow's arm and whirled him about, and a moment later half a dozen ready hands propelled him outside of the meeting. It was not thought worth while to make an arrest.

—The comparatively new disease known as infantile paralysis is now said to have been known over seventy years ago, when well authenticated cases occurred in Louisiana and different parts of Europe. It broke out anew in 1881 and again in 1904. Three years later it had 2,500 victims in New York City. The medical profession is still undecided as to the actual cause and nature of the disease, which is now known as poliomyelitis. It is unquestionably infectious. Recent investigations at the new Rockefeller Hospital have succeeded in tracing the inception of the disease to the spinal cord, from which it spreads to different parts of the body. It can be communicated through the nose and throat. Experiments have shown that a person can be rendered immune to the disease by inoculation.

—In a public letter the Committee of 100 on National Health makes some timely and instructive suggestions relative to the bill now before Congress to establish a Department of Public Health. Its first object is to co-ordinate bureaus and divisions already occupied with sanitary, medical, biological and relief service, under the Federal Government. The other main purpose of the bill is to collect data, and to make research, as well as to render service to other departments. The Committee appeals for support for the bill among the churches, which "have nothing to lose but much to gain in support of the movement to encourage the individual American to be a more efficient type of individual. Nothing is more to the credit of the broad-minded leaders in religious life, regardless of denominational connection, than their ability to see that this is a cause in which right-minded citizens may dutifully enlist for the noble end to be accomplished."

How Thousands of Babies Are Saved

A Well-Fed Baby

A Typical Scene in a Milk Depot

Board of Health Physician Teaching Mother

WE are making in the American city, these days, strenuous efforts to save the baby. There is, perhaps, in all God's world, nothing so frail and in need of care as those created in his image, and at an age when they most resemble the angels. We have made one great discovery. We have found that the great social calamity, infant mortality, is preventable. And so we rush to the rescue and try to save the chubby-bodied, laughing-eyed little cherub, the joy of parents and the asset of the race.

It is hard work and, though we are constantly gaining skill in saving life, those employed in the task, kind doctors, social workers and philanthropists, are taxing their energies in this fight for the baby. It is especially difficult in the large cities, where pure air, pure milk and light are at a premium and where the lack of these essentials is responsible for the untimely death of thousands.

But we are winning best in this great war against deadly conditions. It is uphill work, with avarice, ignorance and poverty to be met. But slowly and surely we are conquering, and the flag of the Red Cross waves the signal of ultimate success.

The Slaughter of the Innocents

Figures do not lie, and those gathered tell of an infant mortality that is as astonishing as it is shocking. Statistics issued by the New York Milk Commission show that there are in the Island of Manhattan alone 12,500 babies whose mothers, either because of hunger, weakness, employment or some other equally distressing reason, are unable to nurse them. Those babies need help. They are sickly, feeble and delicate. Of the 123,433 babies born in New York in 1909, one-eighth died under twelve months. This slaughter of the innocents reaches fearful proportions during the hot summer months, when, at times, the death harvest is 3,000 per month. These were the figures of July, 1908.

In addition to the heat, ignorance, poverty and adulterated food contribute to the general distress. Immigrant mothers born and raised in the provinces of sunny Italy, or spacious Russia, are at a loss when huddled together in crowded tenements where, in accordance with discoveries made at the recent census, as many as 350 persons live in one house.

The report of the Tenement House Department for the quarter ending June 30 last year, states that there are in Manhattan 118,211 living-rooms in tenement houses without adequate light, and 36,825 without windows. It is not wise to juggle with figures, but from what is known of congestion in New York an average of three children for each dark room would be a conservative estimate. This would force the conclusion that there are to-day 465,108 children deprived of air and light in the largest and richest city in America. Adulterated food is another factor which has to be considered.

We are, however, beginning to realize the seriousness of the situation and are waking up to the fact that if society is at all organized for the protection of the individual, it is the youngest, weakest and frailest of the individuals that claim attention. The Board of Health of the City of New York has established a Child Hygiene Department; the social workers and charitable societies, in conjunction with the Department of Health, have formed the Conference on the Summer Care for Babies, and voluntary contributions of individuals have made possible the establishment of the Milk Commission. The work of these societies, in addition to that done by Nathan Straus and several private institutions, makes a good campaign against infant mortality. Pure milk is distributed and mothers are taught the delicate and all-important duties of caring for their babies.

The campaign is in its infancy and so far only 3,500 of the 12,500 babies are fed on pure milk. Nathan Straus is feeding 2,500 a day; the Milk Committee, in its four stations, is feeding 500 a day; the Good Samaritan Society is feeding 200 a day, and other agencies are feeding 300 a day. The Diet Kitchen also, in addition to caring for large numbers of sick and convalescent people, is contributing quantities of milk to mothers and infants.

With the milk goes the inestimable instruction of the physicians who volunteer their services to the cause of saving the lives of babies.

About thirty doctors attend to the hundreds of little ones who are fed by the Milk Committee. Three times a week consultations are held in the stations, when infants are examined, weighed and their physical condition carefully scrutinized. The progress in health and gain in flesh are carefully recorded on charts which are kept on file. It is a familiar scene to see hundreds of Italian or Jewish women bring their frail, emaciated, sickly, but therefore more beloved little tots to the physicians, who with great tenderness and praiseworthy patience convey to the mothers the instructions that help the babies to escape the dangers with which they are threatened.

Summer Care for Babies

The Board of Health has a staff of 161 physicians and 142 nurses, who have many duties to perform. They have to inspect the 650,000 school children; they watch over the practice of 1,200 midwives; they attend to 79 day nurseries, where 7,000 children are taken care of; they examine graduated school children who apply for working papers; they visit the 3,000 foundlings who are "farmed out"; they visit the congested districts to teach mothers the first step of coping with sudden disease.

During the summer months, when the schools are closed, the work of these doctors and nurses is centred on checking infant mortality, and they are enlisted in the campaign known as "Summer Care for Babies."

These workers can be seen daily on the various recreation piers, on the playgrounds and on the numerous excursions arranged by charitable societies for the children.

This educational campaign is perhaps the most important of all the work done by the department. It has been discovered that individual attention does more for the protection of the child than anything else and that mother's care is the greatest promoter of infant life. It has been discovered that little ones do not thrive in institutions, and that even bottle-fed babies do not prosper without mother's care, or its substitute, hired individual service.

For this reason the foundlings of the city are taken out of asylums and are distributed to private families. There are at present no less than 3,000 little ones "farmed out" in this way. They are taken care of by women whose moral character and mode of living are strictly investigated by the Board of Health. Some of the women do it for the love of children, many do it in the hope of healing the wound caused by a painful bereavement, and many poor women do it for the eight dollars per month that the department pays for the care of each child. These children are visited by the nurses of the Health Department, who are vested with the right to revoke the license in case the surroundings are found unsatisfactory.

The advantages of individual attention over th of institutions were explained by Dr. Josephine Baker, the head of the Child Hygiene Departmer in an interview with the writer. She said: "It is fact that infants do not thrive in institutions. W have so far not discovered the reasons for it, but v know that the death-rate reaches forty per cent

While the work of caring for infants is still in i infancy, results achieved have already proven i efficiency and have rewarded our efforts with a lar saving of life. While the number of infants wl died in New York City in 1900 under twelve yea was 16,640, or 203 per thousand births, in 1909 decreased to 15,977, or 129 per thousand birth These figures are low when it is learned that some parts of Russia one child in every two has bee known to die under twelve months.

And so the good work is going on and we are sa ing the little tots who are threatened by avaric ignorance, poverty and disease. We are not doir as much as we should do, but we are waking up the realization of a social duty, called into consciou ness by "the bitter cry of the children," a cry th compels greater activity on the part of any one wl wishes to serve the race. Plans are now on foot th will widen the sphere of activities to dimensio equal to the demand, and the day is not far o when the human race, in a social capacity, will fu fil the highest of all functions—the protection of tl young.

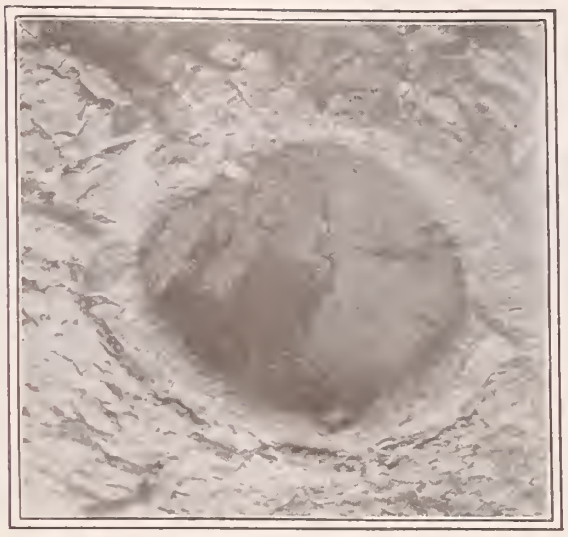
HOW THE TREE DOCTOR WORKS

The Modern Way of Treating a Break



The Old Way of Letting a Wound Heal

A Tree Which Has Been Filled With Cement

By F. A. COLLINS

N several American cities the general health of the trees is watched no less closely than that of the general population. The priceless value of ıade trees, in relieving the long fixed lines of our ty streets and bringing a breath of the country to ır very doors and windows, has never been so fully ealized as during the last few years. In several olleges the study of city forestry is made a special ourse and students are especially trained to perorm this work.

The care with which the work is organized and rected will come as a surprise to the average citi-n. In Brooklyn, where the city forestry work is ery well organized, a complete census is kept of very tree throughout the city. There are some 5,000 of these trees, and naturally a regular sysm must be followed in keeping the records. A ard index system is employed, in which a separate ard is filled out and kept on record for every tree. he locality of the tree, its approximate age and eneral health are carefully observed and set down. corps of trained inspectors go about the city visitg and inspecting every tree at least once a year, nd, if the health of the tree be precarious, at more equent intervals.

City trees are subject to a greater variety of ills an their country cousins, and the list of ailments or which they must be treated is a long one. If a ee, for example, be attacked by any dangerous nsect, bug or growth of any kind, the fact is ecorded on its card at headquarters, and a skilful ee doctor prescribes for it. The prescription is lled at the city's expense, and the medicine is duly dministered. Scores of letters are received daily y the city forester notifying him of the appearance f tree insects or the unhealthful appearance of the ees; the reports are carefully entered in the card ndex, and the tree doctor is sent out to examine ıe patient.

The tree doctor even maintains an emergency epartment to care for trees whose cases demand nmediate attention. After a severe storm, for xample, a number of trees are likely to be split and roken. It often happens that a delay of a few ours in caring for them may endanger the life of tree, or result in its being seriously disfigured for fe. What amounts to an ambulance service is herefore kept in readiness, so that within a few inutes after a telephone emergency call is received, ıe tree surgeon, with all the apparatus necessary or performing the most daring surgical operations, ıay be on the way. During the past year more ıan 4,000 such surgical operations have been perormed on the trees of Brooklyn, and have proved lmost invariably successful.

The wonders of tree surgery will amaze the averge layman in such matters. It is only a few years nce the ravages of a severe wind storm would have roved fatal to many trees in its path. It was cusomary merely to cut off the broken or splintered mb and leave the wound to heal as best it could. f the tree were badly split it was removed. To-day ew accidents to trees prove fatal. The fractured urface is first treated antiseptically. It has been ound that these exposed surfaces of living wood re sensitive to many germs. The air itself is full f germs dangerous to trees, and if these be allowed o lodge and develop they will gradually produce a ore, and if neglected will eat out the very heart of ıe tree.

The broken parts are then brought together and ound up. A wound of this kind, intelligently reated, will heal itself completely and the tree will ı time be as strong as ever. The latest idea in ree surgery is to bind the parts together by means of metal bars passing directly through the limbs, tightened by bolts at either end. The practice of binding the broken parts together by metal bands is discouraged, since a tight band tends to check the free circulation of the sap and hinder the healing process. Then again the tree is likely to grow about the metal band and sustain serious injury.

A wound of this kind, even after it has been skilfully treated, must be carefully watched. There is considerable danger of water working its way into these crevices and hindering the knitting process, perhaps causing the entire interior to decay. To prevent this, ingenious sheds of concrete or metal are built about the exposed surface to shelter them. The cutting of a limb is performed with the same scientific attention. The limbs are cut at a carefully calculated angle, and the exposed surface is treated with antiseptic washes or salves to protect the living fibres from germ infection. It is a familiar sight, of course, to see such surfaces badly healed over and with decayed centres, which eat their way deep into the tree.

Tree Doctors—Saving a Tree After a Storm

When the tree is infected by fungus germs, for instance, the modern tree surgeon goes to the very bottom of the problem. The affected part is skilfully cut away, no matter how deeply it may extend, and the exposed surface is washed with antiseptics. Should the infection extend so deep that it cannot be cut away without weakening the tree, a powerful antiseptic solution is forced into the hole or crevices with a syringe. The cavity is then treated almost as carefully as that of a tooth, and is filled with concrete. The filling must be applied so that the new wood will grow about it and heal the wound neatly.

Notable progress has been made in the use of plates for bracing trees or protecting wounds. Where the tree stands in an exposed position and vibrates or sways in the wind, metal plates are used to prevent its cracking. A concrete-filled cavity, for instance, will be quickly loosened by such motion and cracked. For such patients a metal plate, carefully shaped, is inserted to keep the concrete in position. After all such operations the patient is visited regularly, even after the period of convalescence has passed, to watch its progress. In treating trees where deep cracks or holes are affected, which cannot be reached with the knife or the syringe, it is customary to fumigate the interior, first closing all escapes for the fumes. In extreme cases, where a decayed part extends through the trunk for a considerable distance, a pillar of concrete is built up inside. If the cavity be very large the concrete may be reinforced to keep it in position.

The forester anticipates the ravages of insects of all kinds by regulating treatment at fixed intervals. In the spring all the trees are carefully sprayed to remove the scales and to guard against the attacks of insects. Half a dozen spraying machines are employed for the work, each accompanied by from two to four men. The regular spraying machine is equipped with twelve sprays. The solutions used will prove fatal to all forms of plant lice. The gathering of cocoons and larvæ of all kinds goes on practically throughout the year. These are scraped from the trees, collected and burned, tons of them at a time. It is only a few years since trees were treated for protection by painting the trunks with unsightly white washes, or surrounding their trunks with untidy looking bands of white cotton. This treatment has been done away with and the up-to-date tree doctor attacks the trouble with knife and antiseptic solutions.

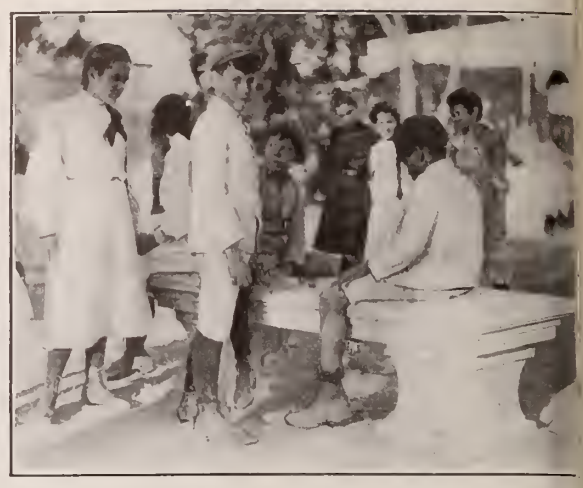
PLANTATION LIFE IN PORTO RICO

A Porto Rican Holiday

Carrying Coffee to Town



Schoolboys and Girls of the Island

By MARY LEITCH

MY happiest experience in Porto Rico was a Sabbath spent at Citrus, several months ago, at the plantation house of the Tropical Fruit-Growers. I was awakened in the early morning by songs of the mocking-birds in the shrubbery. I could also hear the gentle murmur of the ocean two miles distant. The vigor and thrill and strength of June were in the air, although my calendar showed the date to be the twentieth of February. Every window and door in the house was open, and had been open all night, as is the custom in American houses in Porto Rico the year around in that delightful climate.

I could not but agree with Mr. Rudolph Aronson, who knows Porto Rico well, and who says that the island will become the "Riviera of America and the greatest resort in the Western Hemisphere."

As I had lived ten years in Ceylon, I had learned to love the early mornings in the tropics. I took my cup of coffee on the front verandah, enjoying the view from there, which was simply enchanting. This plantation house is on a knoll. To the north one can see the ocean and a coast line of some twenty miles. Several hundred acres of beautiful orange, grape-fruit and mango groves lay all around the knoll, and to the south one can see the wooded hills of the interior.

The inmates of this plantation house were Mr. N. P. Tyler, the manager, and his two American assistants, also Rev. and Mrs. Woodsum and their two daughters. The visitors, beside myself, were Mrs. Isabella C. Davis, one of the founders of the International Orders of King's Daughters and Sons, and Mr. A. H. Bartley.

Morning prayers and Sunday School were held in the plantation house in the morning, and after lunch the Porto Ricans from far and near were invited to a service in Spanish conducted by Mr. Woodsum. It was a joy to see the people coming to the meeting. Not only the laborers on the plantation attended, but also members of several wealthy Porto Rican families living near by, who are owners of sugar-cane lands. A company of between thirty and forty persons gathered together. These people were nominally Catholics, but the human heart is the same the world around, and they seemed to me as eager to hear the message of the Gospel as any I had ever seen. Their faces shone with joy as the hymns were sung in Spanish, in which they joined heartily. They nodded assent as the different speakers told the story of God's love for us, and all joined reverently in the Lord's prayer at the close.

The Ponderous City Gate of San Juan

Sometimes an English service is held in this plantation house, to which neighboring planters are invited. Government officials, planters and visitors are made cordially welcome in this hospitable home and it is hoped that what is being done here may be copied on other plantations. There are said to be over one thousand Americans on the island. Each should be a centre of light in his own neighborhood.

Missionaries, ministers, Christian workers and their friends, who believe in feeding the hungry as well as teaching the ignorant, have introduced into Porto Rico a new industry—the growing of the East India grafted mango fruit. Mr. David Fairchild of the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.—through whose office was introduced into the United States the Durum wheat (macaroni wheat) which has been worth millions of dollars to the country—has said that the coming of the grafted mango to Porto Rico, like the introduction of the navel orange into California, may be a matter of the greatest importance. He thinks it will become one of the leading industries of the island, as it is one of the most delicious of fruits. The Agricultural Department is supplying young grafted mango trees, which the department has been gathering for the past ten years or more from Ceylon, India, Java, the east coast of Africa, the Philippines and the Pacific Islands.

On the Citrus plantation there are now a thousand of these grafted mango trees, embracing thirty varieties. A mature mango tree will bear several thousand fruits yearly. This new industry should prove a benefit to the people of Porto Rico. It may do as much for them as Sheldon Jackson's reindeer industry did for Alaska, or as the development of the banana industry by Captain Baker did for Jamaica. It proved the economic salvation of Jamaica, and is one of the most popular fruits on that island.

and others were many feet deep in water. The police ordered all the people out of their homes in the main section of town, and we helped some out. We brought a number here. It was close to midnight when we lay down on our parlor floor to sleep. During the night it stopped raining, and Thursday dawned agreeably bright and clear.

"While we were eating breakfast—which we had to do in relays as we had nine grown-up refugees with us—we were called out to help save a couple of houses.

"No, that was Friday—I can't locate Thursday. My diary for Thursday says: 'Around town, helping all day.' But on Friday, another bright day, we hustled off from the breakfast table to work in the swollen river all morning. We cut down trees, dragged gravestones, built dams, deepened the river bed, tried to make new channels. My hands and legs are still considerably skinned. The river washed away several Japanese graveyards, and we found the stones good for making dams.

"I started to lift one stone from its place, already quite deep in water, when a Japanese woman standing on a bank near by begged me not to remove that stone. She said she did not care about all the others, but that one was specially dear to her. She stood there a good part of the morning and kept the stone unmolested. Saturday it rained again all day, and I spent the whole morning again in the river, working on a dam. Sunday afternoon went in the same way, in doing helpful work, and also Monday and Tuesday.

"It is now Thursday. Yesterday, a company of soldiers came to do construction work, and while it is raining to-day, we feel that the flood is over. The water has gone down a good deal. The peculiar kind of soil we have here has produced some strange effects. The whole region is covered with a kind of lava from the volcano. The stream carried this scoria with it, and there are acres and acres in town, built up three feet or more higher than before. I went into one foreigner's cottage, and had to lean way over to keep from hitting the ceiling. You can look in windows and see the tops of chairs sticking out of the earth. The eight tennis courts in the foreign portion are now several feet under the surface of the ground. In some places, the new posts are entirely covered. I suppose the houses will have to be raised. It has been quite an experience. Provisions are beginning to come into town. The governor of the province sent two beeves as a gift to the foreigners. There are about seven or eight hundred foreigners here now, I think. Of course, prices went up. The road to the railroad station is a broad river but pack horses are coming around. It is reported that regular railroad connection with Tokyo will not be completed for two months, but there is quite a roundabout way, which one can take with four spells of walking, I think. The only mail we have had is a Tokyo paper, just a week old. I don't know when we will be able to get back to Hirosaki as conditions are now. We have to go by way of Tokyo."

Why Do You Go to Church?

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

DEARLY as we all loved Mark Twan, and sincerely as we lamented his loss, there came to every heart a pang when we were told by ne of his closest friends that in his latter years iis favorite author and good man ceased to attend nurch. Naturally, in talk around the hearth, the iquiry occurred, and was passed from one to anther, "Why do you go to church?" It may not be miss if the interrogation repeated on this page shall waken thought in many homes. One of the influnces which determine our constant attendance upon hurch reaches backward to the springs of life, and s founded upon habit. When we were children at ome, under the care and authority f Christian parents, we went to hurch as a matter of course every unday of our lives. We went to unday School, too, but the Sunday chool was not a substitute for going o church. We sat in the pew and efore we could understand the minster's sermon we enjoyed the hymns, he Scripture reading and the prayer, nd little by little we began to enjoy he beautiful words that we heard rom the pulpit. Very likely we were aught to repeat the text when church vas over for the day.

You of whom the question is asked hay reply, "I attend church because t is my duty. I wish to set a good xample to my neighbors and to exert wholesome influence in the commuity. I have noticed that when a heatre or a saloon gets into the viinity property is at once depreciated. Nobody wishes to invest money in the ame block with theatre or saloon. A church, on the other hand, is a reat advantage financially in a treet or a town. The houses around t become more valuable than before, nd a fine class of people move in and ettle down under its shadow. The hurch stands for the best in morals, or peace, good will and respectabilty. In every way it is the opposite f the liquor store and the playouse. Unless I and other people atend church and help in its material upport our town will suffer and our oys be led into temptation. In this ountry the church and the school re twin forces for good. Upholding ne, I must uphold the other."

Perhaps another man might answer: "My reason for going to church s that I wish to have the spiritual art of my nature cultivated. On the Sabbath it is my hope to escape from he sordid atmosphere of the week nto a region calm and beautiful with the peace of God. I can do this far better by worshiping God in his wn house among his people than by sitting at home reading and lounging. I find that I am rested and strengthened for the trials of the week by attendance upon church services. I also make a great gain mentally by listening to the words of the preacher. I believe that in attending church I am imitating my Saviour, who when on earth went every week to worship in the synagogue."

Yet another voice replies to the question: "I enjoy going to church because I meet a great many friends there. I like to look into their faces and exchange greetings with them as I enter and depart. I never go, even when I go with some reluctance, without having a feeling of positive thankfulness in my heart on the return to my home."

Woman and the Ballot A subject which has forged to the front in the minds of thoughtful women, more and more insistently pressing upon them as the years pass, is whether or not women should vote. No intelligent person in these days assumes that women are not sufficiently gifted with reason to exercise this privilege as men do. Many people think that women are already so burdened by responsibilities belonging to their own life and by circumstances connected with their physical health, that they should not be called upon to take a hand in politics. As, however, it must be conceded that politics include the school question, and the property rights of women, the argument in favor of suffrage is strengthened by this obvious fact. The occasion for the voting of women is greater in some States of our Union than in others. It must be decided in every case by the will of the majority in the individual State. Women need not fear that they will be forced to vote in this free land, nor that the ballot will be refused them when they really desire it. The letters which follow are sent to us by readers.

Albert I., Belgium's New Reigning Monarch, and Family

THIS interesting group presents Albert I., sovereign of the Belgians, and his family. He is the successor of the late King Leopold, who in the latter years of his life attained unenviable notoriety on account of his oppression of the natives in the Congo Free State. The new king is a man of modern ideas and noble character.

One Woman's View "I think women are as much entitled to vote as men are, but from my own experience I think they have enough to do to attend to their home, church and social duties. Personally I do not care for the ballot, but if it were given to the women of my State, I should feel that it was my duty to use it. I do not think that one woman out of ten keeps well enough informed about the political issues of the day to be an intelligent voter. A true woman's influence is strong enough to win votes for her political friends, and she can, by talking with the husband, father and brother, win them to her side in the race. M. K."

"I believe the country would be better off if women could vote. Some argue that women would neglect their homes. A woman's first duty is to her home and family, and nothing else is important in comparison. A woman who would neglect her home for politics would neglect it for almost any other excuse. A vote can be cast in a very brief time. Let the men be the campaigners and leaders. They have the time. If a woman has the right to vote she will naturally take more interest in political questions, and if she be not ambitious enough to inform herself on the issues of the day, her vote can do no more harm than that of an ignorant man. If she informs herself, she may influence the votes of her husband and sons. Most women favor cleanliness and morality, and if they stand by their colors at the polls, the country must feel it and be benefited. (MRS.) J. F. S."

"I am more and more convinced that it is most desirable that women should have the ballot. I would not be in favor of a woman President of the United States, nor of women holding the higher offices in our nation, but I do believe they should have equal wages with men for work equally well done. Women have property rights and should be allowed to vote in the making of the laws. They are interested in the children and the schools, and in temperance. They and the children are the great sufferers from intemperance. I do believe that if women had the ballot they would vote the saloon out. (MRS.) E. H. L."

"In my judgment, the proper division of labor inside the home and outside are fundamentally indicated in sex. Man is the stronger in body and for ages he has been the one to whom the rough work has been committed. It is his part to dig foundations, build bridges, navigate the ocean and fight the battles of the world. Ours is the mother-sex. We have the training of the boys and girls in our hands in the first ten years of life; we have a great deal of the finer, more ornamental work to do, and we have the priceless weapon of influence. Why should we lay aside our queenly dignity and put ourselves on the level of the men who must fight and bear the brunt in modern life? I have always been opposed to woman's suffrage, and I do not expect to change my mind.

"(MRS.) R. S. T."

Pencils and Paint Box A generous supply of paper and card board with several pencils and a paint box fitted with a number of colors and two or three camel's hair brushes afford unfailing amusement to children on those days when for reasons of weather or convalescence they are detained indoors. An active child must be provided with something interesting to do.

Unless this is done mothers and aunties will assuredly be interrupted every little while by the despairing question, "Now, what shall I do?" One cannot blame the children if time hangs heavily on their hands when no avenue is opened for their entertainment and they are obliged to keep quiet lest romping disturb their elders. If we do not provide some legitimate outlet for the child's animal spirits and pure love of fun, it is liable to find some way not to our liking.

NEVER BEFORE SUCH A WITH SUCH

We want you to accept every word of this announcement in its most exact and literal sense. Therefore, we repeat—never before, such a car, at such a price, with such a guarantee. And we take the liberty of reminding you that it is the Hupp Motor Car Company which is Based on the Three Years' Experience of 7500 Hupmobiles This New $900 Touring Car Will Cost the Owner Who Keeps It at Home 20 to 25 Cents a Day

We could cut short the statement in the headline and say "never before such a car at such a price;" and it would be literally true. Never before, for instance, has so large a touring car (its 110 inch wheelbase has no parallel under $1200) been sold for $900.

Never before has a touring car with sliding gear transmission and Bosch magneto been sold for less than $1000.

But it is only when we add "with such a guarantee" that the full force and importance of this offering is made clear. No such guarantee has ever been placed on any car at any price. It covers the life of the car. It emphasizes the extraordinary value of such a car at such a price. It introduces into the manufacture of motor cars a new element of responsibility and reliability. Two years, three years, six years from now, you can look to the maker to make good any defect.

Not to the dealer, mind you, but the maker—the Hupp Motor Car Company.

This new Hupmobile, therefore, first raises the value and lowers the price in the touring car class. It gives you the kind of a touring car you couldn't afford before; at a price you can afford. Then it assures you that this great stride forward has not been made at the sacrifice of quality, by guaranteeing the goodness and the soundness of the car during its entire life time.

The plant of the Hupp Motor Car Company at Detroit has been working toward this great economic achievement for three years. The materials have all been in hand for months. The motors for several months' supply are made. The forging plant, the machine shops, and all the other manufacturing departments are working double shift. The cars are being assembled as we write.

Delivery to 58 Cities November 1st —Go to Your Hupmobile Dealer and Place a Reservation Order at Once

We are serious in urging you to see your Hupmobile dealer at once. We believe that 150 cities should absorb, within 30 days, all the new cars we can build in three months' time.

Hupmobile production, large as it is, has never kept pace with Hupmobile demand. Your dealer will buy a large quantity; but you should help him to insure you against disappointment by an early order. He will number your reservation in the order in which it is received; and if you choose to cancel later on, your "place in line" will be allotted to some one else.

The average cost of upkeep to the Hupmobile owner who keeps his car at home is 20 to 25 cents a day.

A battery of three Hupmobiles—the two-passenger Hupmobile Runabout at $750; the four-passenger Touring Car at $900; and the three-passenger Coupe at $1100—represents a total investment of only $2750.

These three cars, with carrying capacity for nine passengers, each or all available at any time you want them; or for any purpose for which you want them, in any kind of weather; can be maintained more economically than one big car.

Hundreds of Hupmobile owners have found, in the past three years, that they could use their Hupmobiles quickly, conveniently and with dispatch, five times, where they could use their large car once. Many are substituting the three Hupmobile types for their large car.

If you want any further assurance of the value of this wonderful new Hupmobile than is given by the sweeping guarantee, which covers its entire lifetime—a word or two about the Hupmobile Runabout will not be out of place.

The other day a Hupmobile in California fell over a cliff 500 feet high. It cost the owner just $45 to put it back in perfect condition.

There is not a crippled Hupmobile in America, unless it has been crushed in some accident.

There is not even a second-hand Hupmobile.

Year-old Hupmobiles command pretty near full list price.

Every "Hup" that started going three seasons ago is still going.

Hupmobiles, because of their readiness, are probably kept more continuously in commission than any other make of car—yet their repair expense is ridiculously low; and a discontented Hupmobile owner is as rare as a white blackbird.

AN army unlike all other armies, in that it can never again be recruited, is the Grand Army of the Republic, which met in its Forty-fourth Annual National Encampment at Atlantic City, N. J., September 19 to 25.

At this meeting there were at least 32,000 less living veterans represented than at the Salt Lake City Encampment in 1909; for about ninety names a day have been dropped from the pension rolls during the year. A peculiar pathos attaches to the Grand Army conventions. In the very nature of things it will not be long before these assemblies will have passed into history. The annual Encampment is the one great event of the year to most of the veterans; and each gathering is sure to be the last meeting on earth for many of the aged comrades. Consequently special efforts are put forth by the local entertainers each year to make the occasion delightful and memorable to the old soldiers.

Great preparations were made at Atlantic City to receive and honor the nation's heroes. Headquarters were provided on Young's Ocean Pier, where the Governor of New Jersey, the Mayor, and others voiced the greetings of the city on Tuesday evening, September 20. The parade was scheduled for Wednesday, September 21, and the business sessions for September 22.

Among the business matters acted on were the new rules to make United States soldiers and sailors who served in the revenue cutter service from 1861 to 1865 eligible to membership; to grant to Sons of Veterans the privilege of sitting in the regular meetings of the G. A. R. except during the ceremony of muster-in; and to establish associate memberships for each G. A. R. Post of patriotic citizens, who will lend encouragement and support to the objects of the G. A. R.

The sessions were presided over by Hon. Samuel Rinnah Van Sant, commander in chief, who served three years as private and corporal in Illinois cavalry; was speaker of the Minnesota House of Representatives and Governor of the State; and is head of a big steam navigation company.

During the year the Grand Army has made special efforts to enrol all the living veterans, and to secure additions to the Southern Memorial Fund, in order that the graves of the 300,000 comrades who died in prisons, hospitals, or on the battlefields of the South, now resting in national cemeteries, may receive proper attention on Memorial Day.

Respect for the sacredness and solemnity of the Memorial Day observance has been impressed, urging attendance upon divine service on Sunday preceding, the holding of patriotic services in public schools, and the decorating of the graves of Confederate as well as Union soldiers.

The proper observance of Flag Day has also been emphasized and the display of the flag commended as the most impressive way to teach the lessons of patriotism so essential to the nation's life. And Mother's Day has again been observed in memory of the sufferings and sacrifices made by the devoted mothers of 1861 to 1865. The work of patriotic instruction; of placing memorials; of securing legislation for veterans in the public service; of establishing national parks, etc., has been earnestly promoted during the year. Among the plans urged are the proposed "Lincoln Way"—a highway from the National Capital to Gettysburg—as a Lincoln centennial memorial, and the observance of the semicentennial of the battle of Gettysburg.

Among the 32,000 deaths of the year there stands out prominently the name of the faithful "Christian soldier," Major-General Oliver O. Howard, the last of the surviving generals who commanded an independent army, and who in a marked degree combined the qualities of the heroic soldier with those of the devoted Christian.

The Woman's Relief Corps; the Sons and Daughters of Veterans; the Ladies of the G. A. R.; and the Army Nurse Association (bodies affiliated with the G. A. R.) also held their annual sessions during Encampment week. The leader of the Woman's Relief Corps this year is Mrs. Jennie Iowa Berry, an efficient past-president of the Iowa organization and deeply interested in juvenile court, industrial school and civic improvement, as well as patriotic work. The Woman's Relief Corps has a membership of over 160,000 in nearly 3,000 corps; has doubled its Christmas donation to the old army nurses; contributed to Memorial University, the Francis Scott Key Home, the Southern Memorial Fund and other worthy objects. The work for patriotic instruction and for peace and arbitration has made great progress during the year. The new department of Utah is welcomed this year and a provisional department is established in Mississippi. The women are petitioning to Congress for a national law to protect the flag, and are urging a sane Fourth, pointing out that in seven years of Independence Day celebrations the record of wounded and dead reached 34,603.

THE OLD PIANO

By CHARLOTTE DODGE BROMBACHER

"ROY, you're just the one I want to see."

"I'm very glad my society is appreciated. What can I do for you, Ben?"

They had been college chums, these two, and firm friends ever since; and to each other were always Roy and Ben. Young they were, but by industry, perseverance and square dealing, had risen to fine positions in the business world; and Ben, who was now the proprietor of the Wilson Piano Warerooms, replied to Roy, who had looked in on his way to his own office one sultry August morning, "I want you to go down to the Mission rooms to-morrow night and play the hymns."

"Me play the hymns? Well, I never!"

"Yes. Why not? You were a good musician before you went to Europe, five years ago. Somebody has presented the Mission with a piano, but there is no one to play."

"Well, I——"

"Now don't say well; say yes. I'll 'phone that you'll be on hand and they'll be delighted."

"Well—I'll go if I get back in time."

"Why, where are you going?"

"Out to Forestville to see those friends of five years ago. I was sent there on business for the railroad, you know, and was in the village all summer. I have not heard from them since."

"All right. I'd go out of the city myself this hot weather, if I could."

"Have a carriage, sir?"

"No, I'll walk. I know the way."

As the train steamed out of the Forestville station, Roy, who had just alighted, started briskly up the hill. "I'll be there before sundown," he said to himself, as he scanned each well-known landmark, his fine eyes lighting up with pleased recognition. "Everything looks just the same. Here's where I used to gather wild roses for Margaret, and there's the pond where we went rowing for water lilies. How long ago that was! There's the chestnut tree on the corner of the road, and here's Rover coming to meet me. Oh, no; it's a strange dog. I suppose poor old Rover is dead by this time. Here's the house! Why—oh, why—what's the matter with it?"

Instead of the trim leaf-embowered cottage, that he knew so well, Roy saw a cottage to be sure, but shabby, unpainted and covered with straggling, half dead vines, while on one of the posts of the porch was a sign-board on which was printed "To Let."

Astonished, shocked and bitterly disappointed, Roy looked hopelessly around, and then leaning with folded arms on the broken fence, recalled that happy summer when the family had been so kind to him, a stranger, making his way alone in the world. He thought of the friendly father and the gentle mother, so like his own whom he had laid to rest beside his father, near the ivy-covered church in his native village, just before he came to Forestville. Of sweet Margaret and her merry litle sister Ethel. Gone—all gone. He had written several times to the family, but had received no reply, and he had looked forward so confidently to seeing them all again in their old home, and learning the reason of their long silence.

A light breeze stirred the bushes in the neglected garden, and swung the obnoxious sign on the porch, but bore the fragrance of roses, like those that Margaret wore the night he went away. Ethel was a little girl then, and cried when he kissed her good-by. Margaret cried too, after he had gone, but he did not know that. He was only one, he thought, among her many friends, even when she gave him the rose he asked for, as he held her hand in a lingering clasp at parting.

The sun went down behind the familiar hills, and as Roy turned reluctantly away from the dismantled home, he felt as if it were sunset in his heart as well.

"I'll go down to the village," he thought, "and make inquiries." And just then a boy, driving a cow, came around by the chestnut tree, to whom Roy put the query: "Can you tell me where the Randolphs live now?"

"Hey?" said the boy, pushing back his torn straw hat, and staring at the questioner.

"The Randolphs; can you tell me where they live?"

"Never heard of 'em."

"Thank you. Good-by."

"Good-by. G'lang there!"

This last was addressed to the cow, who was leisurely cropping grass by the roadside.

"I've only been here a year, and never heard of those people," said the brisk mistress of the postoffice, in response to Roy's inquiry. "Perhaps they can tell you at the hotel." Repairing thither, Roy was informed by the proprietor that the family had moved away several years before, but had left no address with him. The village pastor and the two physicians were next interviewed. None of all these people knew who had the renting of the cottage, nor did any one else of whom Roy inquired; but they all said it was no one in Forestville, and the address on the signboard was obliterated by rain and snow. Neither could the ticket agent give definite information. "Their trunks and furniture were marked New York," said he, "and you might as well look for a needle in a hay-stack as to try to find them there."

"Oh, no; I'll look in the directory. There comes my train. Good-night, and thank you."

"This is the hottest day of the season," said Ben, the next morning, wiping his perspiring face, as Roy entered. "How are your friends in Forestville?"

"They've moved away, but I found, in the directory last night, Margaret Randolph, widow of Edward, 27 Fairview Terrace. She is the widow of Mr. Randolph's brother Edward, and as that is her address, I'm going there."

"Well, success to you, and don't forget the Mission to-night."

The piano that was carried into the Mission room that morning by stalwart porters was a present from one who could afford to give it away. It was old, but like many old people, well-preserved and exceedingly sweet-toned. True, it was square, which characteristic in regard to pianos in these days seems to be undesirable and stamps them out of date. But it was not to be mentioned in the same day with the wheezy old melodeon which had done duty so long, for it was an extremely fine instrument, although outwardly old-fashioned. "We'll have a crowd here to-night," said the superintendent joyfully, "for all the neighbors know about the piano, and some of them saw it carried in." And through the long hot day, many looked forward to the evening with pleasant anticipation.

Never in all his life had Roy spent such a day as this one, when the Old Piano was taken to the Mission rooms, while he tried to find the Randolphs. The heat was intense; not a breath of air; blistering pavements in the city, and dusty roads in the suburbs, where he arrived after changing cars three times, and waiting for them on hot corners of hot streets. Fairview Terrace was three long shadeless blocks from the trolley line, the Fairview being in imagination, or perhaps in anticipation, as the present outlook showed principally car-barns and open lots, the latter decorated with huge billboards of dealers in real estate. The Terrace itself was a collection of detached modern cottages. The numbers had been changed, and 27 was a vacant lot. No one knew Mrs. Randolph.

By noon he had visited every house in the place, and by that time he remembered that he had not had any breakfast, owing to his haste to start, intending to take it later. His head began to feel dizzy, and the intense heat and blinding glare confused him, as, covered with dust and with a wilted collar, he plodded wearily along, trying to get somewhere out of the broiling sun, and away from the flies and mosquitoes, thinking the while, "I don't look presentable now, even if I should find them." It seemed as if he would never reach the trolley line, and he tried to walk faster, but the dizziness increased. There was a buzzing in his ears; then everything seemed to grow dark, and he knew nothing more until he found himself on a hospital cot, a victim of sunstroke.

That night the Old Piano was silent.

Nearly a year passed by. Roy, being young and vigorous, had soon recovered, but had then found a letter awaiting him, which demanded his presence in a distant city, where he was obliged to remain for several months. Immediately on his return, however, he renewed the search, but having no clue, the task was well-nigh hopeless. He visited many real estate offices, hoping to find the agent for the Forestville cottage, but without success, and at last determined to go to the village again. "Perhaps," thought he, "some one may have rented the cottage during my absence, and I may obtain information in that way. I'll go to-morrow."

That evening, in compliance with a renewed request, he went to the Mission room, much to the delight of the cheerful workers there, who gave him a most friendly greeting, while the boisterous applause of the audience was almost impossible to subdue. As he took his place, he wondered what made the Old Piano seem so familiar, and when he struck the first chords, he wondered still more. All the evening he was in a sort of reverie.

"That certainly looks exactly like the Forestville piano," he thought, and as he went over to play the last hymn, something just inside the instrument attracted his attention, and he bent down to examine it. As he did so, a smothered exclamation escaped him, and the matron asked if he were ill, and offered a glass of water. "You are so pale," she said.

"No, thank you," Roy replied. "I've had a great surprise. I'll explain later."

How he managed to play the last hymn, and acknowledge the vote of thanks, he never knew; but when all was over, he said as quietly as he could, for he was trembling like a leaf, "This piano belonged to friends of mine, whom I have been trying to locate for a long time. I know it by that card inside, on which is engraved my name, LeRoy Gordon. I pasted it there myself many years ago. Can you tell me who sent the piano here?" The matron said that she did not know, but would ask the superintendent, who replied to Roy: "The piano was given to us by Mrs. Randolph. I don't know her address, because the business was transacted through an agent, J. C. Brooks, 15 Railroad Square. But she has been here several times, and her nieces also. I expect them again, but don't know when they will come." With thanks, Roy departed, saying he would see Mr. Brooks.

The next morning, at the agent's place of business, Roy found no one but the office boy, who seemed glad to have some one to talk to, as he had nothing to do. "Mr. Brooks," he said, "has gone to Forestville, but I expect him back to-day."

"To Forestville? Then perhaps he can tell me where to find the friends I am looking for."

"Do they live in Forestville?"

"They lived there some years ago, but they have moved away."

"Mr. Brooks' wife came from Forestville. She knows all the neighbors. There's the 'phone. Hello—no—yes—two or three, a gentleman, all right." Turning to Roy, "Mr. Brooks is down town now. He'll be here in half an hour." And in less than that time, Mr. Brooks arrived.

He was an elderly man, shrewd, good-natured and given to speaking in short sentences. "Good morning, sir," said he, "hot weather. Joe," to the boy, "start the electric fan." Roy made known his errand, and Mr. Brooks replied, "Yes, I moved that piano. I'm not the agent for the cottage. Don't know who is. Moved the piano about a year ago. Randolphs had left Forestville long before. Piano was stored in a barn. Very fine family. Had lots of trouble. Moved to a little town near Chicago. Mr. and Mrs. Randolph died."

"Is it possible?" exclaimed Roy, greatly shocked.

"Yes—yes—very sad. You didn't know, did you?"

"Oh, no—no."

"Daughters came back to New York. Lived with their aunt in Fairview Terrace. Moved away from there. Don't know where they are now. My wife came from their part of the country. Six miles back from the village."

Roy was silent and Mr. Brooks forbore further remarks. Presently Joe exclaimed, "Mrs. Randolph was here yesterday." Roy started. "Why didn't you say so before?" asked Mr. Brooks, pretending to be angry.

"Couldn't get a word in edgewise," retorted Joe, adding, "Cross old party."

"Joe, be careful. What did she want?"

"Wanted to see you about storage. Said maybe she'd come back. Then she wanted a piano tuner, and I sent her to the Wilson Warerooms."

"How do you know her name was Randolph?" inquired Roy.

"Where is it?" Mr. Brooks asked.

"I put it on your desk, but I guess that old electric fan blew it off. Here it is on the floor. I told her there was no address on it, and she said that was none of my affairs." Mr. Brooks laughed, but Roy was too much stunned by the sad news he had heard, even to smile. "Here is my card," he said to Mr. Brooks. "If Mrs. Randolph should come in again, will you kindly give it to her, and tell her how I have tried to find the family, and ask her if I may call on her, and if she will leave her address with you, and then will you let me know?"

Then as Roy went out, Joe wondered why he gave him a quarter.

Late in the afternoon of that day another card was handed to Ben by an employee, who said, "The lady is in the outer office."

"Tell her I will see her in a few moments," Ben replied, and then announced to Roy, who had just entered, "She's here, Roy. Now you'll find out where they are."

"Who's here?"

"Mrs. Randolph. She has written her address with pencil. Bird's-eye, Bridge, what is it?" Ben held it close to his near-sighted eyes and then handed it to Roy, who read "Burnside Avenue." "That's way up town, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"What's the matter, Roy?"

"I'll tell you later."

"Come with me and be presented to Mrs. Randolph."

"Go on, Ben; I'll come after you've talked business a while."

In the outer office a lady waited, plainly but fashionably dressed, whose face, framed by soft gray hair, would have been pleasing, had the dark eyes been less sharp, and the thin lips less firm. Her expression was stern and her tones crisp, as she asked:

"Can you send a man to tune the piano at the Mission rooms downtown?"

Ben replied that he could and would send one to-morrow, if she wanted one then, to which she curtly answered that when she wanted one, she would let him know; and having inquired the price, and told him to charge it to her, she arose to go, when Roy entered. Then Ben, in the winning manner habitual with him, said: "One moment, Mrs. Randolph, if you please. My friend, who has just come in, was a frequent visitor at the Randolph cottage in Forestville some years ago, and would like to know where the family are now. May I present him?" Mrs. Randolph, with dignity, signified assent, and after coldly acknowledging the introduction, said stiffly, "I do not remember ever hearing your name before, Mr. Gordon. My nieces have never mentioned it, and I never heard Mr. Henry Randolph or his wife speak of you. When were you last in Forestville?"

"About a year ago, madam, but the cottage was then unoccupied, and no one knew where the family were. I had just returned from Europe, where I had been for five years."

"And you had not heard from them in all that time?"

"No, madam."

"And now you expect me to tell you where they are? I don't know as I will. I must find out first if my nieces remember you or"—haughtily—"care to receive you."

Roy flushed, but maintained, otherwise, a calm exterior.

"Have you heard," continued Mrs. Randolph severely, "of the death of Mr. Henry Randolph and his wife?"

"Not until to-day, madam."

"Who told you?"

"Mr. Brooks."

"Strange. Well, Mr. Gordon, my nieces have lived with me ever since their parents died, and I certainly have never heard the name Gordon mentioned in all that time."

During this colloquy, Roy had borne unflinchingly the scrutinizing gaze which accompanied Mrs. Randolph's remarks and questions, but he now felt that it was time for the cross-examination and incivility to cease. Very distinctly and frigidly he said, "If you do not believe me, madam, our conversation has lasted long enough."

Then as he turned to leave her, Ben stepped up to the rescue.

"Roy," said he, and at that name Mrs. Randolph pricked up her ears. "Tell Mrs. Randolph what they always called you."

"Why, Roy, of course."

Mrs. Randolph jumped up as if she had been shot, dropping her eye glasses, pocket book and handkerchief, which articles the two young men picked up and restored to her. "Say that again!" she demanded. "Tell me again what they called you!"

"Madam, they called me Roy."

"Roy—Roy—are you Roy?"

"Yes, madam."

"Is there any other Roy?"

"I have never heard of any other."

THE OLD PIANO

"Are you the Roy that Margaret and Ethel are always talking about and wishing about and wishing to meet again?"

"Yes, madam."

"Did you never write to the family?"

"Oh, yes."

"Where did you direct the letters?"

'To Forestville."

"They left Forestville soon after you went away. Mr. and Mrs. Randolph both wrote to you."

"I never received the letters."

"Are you married?"

"No, madam."

"Well!" said Mrs. Randolph. "Well!" After she had said "Well!" three times, she continued: "When I find myself in the wrong, I am not ashamed to own it. I'm a cross old woman, but wish to apologize. Are you willing to shake hands with me?"

"Certainly."

After a moment, she asked, in her usual severe manner, "Did Mr. Brooks tell you any particulars about the death of my brother-in-law and his wife?"

"He did not."

"Would you like to hear them?"

The abrupt questions jarred upon him, but Roy replied that anything relating to Mr. and Mrs. Randolph would always be of interest to him. "Well, then, sit down and hear me out." And Mrs. Randolph proceeded to tell how they had become homesick for Forestville, and were planning to return, when Mr. Randolph was thrown out of a carriage and instantly killed. Mrs. Randolph had been prostrated in consequence, and never recovered, and related so many harrowing details that Roy wished she would desist. Then her mood changed, and in softer tones she said, "They thought so much of you. They said if their own son had lived, he would have been just your age. Mrs. Randolph asked every day if we had heard from you, and one of the last things she said was, 'Margaret, if you should ever meet Roy——' And then followed the tender farewell message, and as Roy listened, his eyes were full of tears.

Then, with a hasty good-by, and tears in her own eyes, Mrs. Edward Randolph departed, and as Ben escorted her to the door, she said, "Margaret and I expect to go to the Mission room every night next week. Margaret will play on the Old Piano. Tell Roy to come down if he wants to see her. I forgot to mention it. I won't say anything to Margaret, so it will be a surprise for her."

. . . .

"They've all gone away for the summer," said the janitor, in reply to Roy, who having visited the Mission for three evenings, but failed to find Margaret or her aunt, had asked him if he knew when they would be there. "To Forestville?"

"No, I guess they've gone to Europe."

"Why, what makes you think so?"

"Well, I heard 'em talkin' about somebody who went to Europe six years ago and never came back. They said he used to play on the Old Piano, and they seemed kinder sorry, and then the aunt said if they wanted to see him, she guessed they'd have to go to Europe themselves, and the youngest one said, 'I wish we could go, Margaret.' I know they all went somewhere yesterday morning."

"Can that be possible?" thought Roy, as greatly disappointed he turned away. "I don't believe they've gone to Europe. Why did Mrs. Randolph ask me to come?" He almost resolved never to go to the Mission again, and told Ben so, adding that he had actually come to dislike the sight of the Old Piano. He knew now, although he did not say so, that it was Margaret for whom he had been unconsciously waiting during the years of absence. Margaret, whom he had tried so often to meet and failed every time. Therefore, in the dim hope of finding her, and with a sort of grim determination not to give up until he succeeded, he did go to the Mission the next night, but by a different route, for he was tired of going through the same streets, on a fruitless errand, night after night.

"Cheer up, Roy," Ben had said, for, having already wooed and won the choice of his own heart, he felt competent to give advice in that line. "Don't be discouraged. That isn't like you." And so, with that friendly admonition in his mind, and his own habit of perseverance coming to his aid, he entered the room.

And—Margaret was there! He could scarcely believe his eyes, but—that was Margaret at last! Yes, there she was in her white dress, with roses in her chestnut hair, just as he remembered her, and it seemed as if the intervening years had rolled back, and it was but yesterday that he stood beside her on the porch at Forestville. Amid far different surroundings, he made his way to her, through the dispersing crowd, but she did not see him, being occupied on the platform, arranging books and music. Then, when she heard some one say, in a low clear tone, "Margaret!" she wondered who it could be with a voice exactly like Roy's. Turning around, she saw—no, no, it could not be—oh, yes—yes—it was Roy himself, looking the same as in past days, only a little older and slightly careworn. Intense surprise almost took away her breath, as he clasped her hand in both his own, exclaiming, although brokenly, "Margaret! I've—found—you." Then, as the tide of old associations dear and sweet and sad, rushed over her, she could only gasp, "Oh, Roy—Roy!"

"My Margaret? Only mine? My very own?" He whispered tenderly, longing yet fearing to hear the answer.

The room was very quiet. Mrs. Randolph, the committee and the janitor were in the office. The last straggler had departed, and most of the lights had been extinguished, while the rest burned low. No sound broke the silence, save the ticking of the clock on the wall, as Roy waited until Margaret, with her free hand resting on the ivory keys, and her beautiful eyes downcast, softly spoke one little word, and then his arms were around her and in the dim stillness, beside the Old Piano, he folded her to his heart.

One Telephone, Dumb; Five Million, Eloquent

If there were only one telephone in the world it would be exhibited in a glass case as a curiosity.

Even in its simplest form telephone talk requires a second instrument with connecting wires and other accessories.

For real, useful telephone service, there must be a comprehensive system of lines, exchanges, switchboards and auxiliary equipment, with an army of attendants always on duty.

Connected with such a system a telephone instrument ceases to be a curiosity, but becomes part of the great mechanism of universal communication.

To meet the manifold needs of telephone users the Bell System has been built, and today enables twenty-five million people to talk with one another, from five million telephones.

Such service cannot be rendered by any system which does not cover with its exchanges and connecting lines the whole country.

The Bell System meets the needs of the whole public for a telephone service that is united, direct and universal.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

L. S., Bath, Me. 1. How many States are there in the German Empire? 2. How many kingdoms, duchies, etc.?

1. There are twenty-six States in the Empire. 2. There are four kingdoms, five duchies, seven principalities, and three free cities—Luebeck, Bremen, Hamburg—and the Imperial territory of Alsace-Lorraine.

L. A. S., Appleton, Wis. Please explain Mal. 4: 1, 3.

This was a prophecy of the judgment coming on Jerusalem; but it can also be interpreted as foreshadowing God's terrible judgment on the wicked at the final day. The second verse contrasts with this direful picture the effect of the judgment on the righteous. Verse 3 shows that the prosperity of the wicked and the adversity of the godly will be reversed.

G. D. E., New Orleans. What is meant by the perihelion of a planet?

The perihelion is the point on the orbit of a planet where it is nearest the sun. The point opposite is called the apsides, and the straight connecting line between them is called the "line of apsides."

N. H., Whitesboro, Tex. 1. What are the seven great promises in the Bible, and where are they found? 2. Who are the great women of the Bible?

1. The promise to Abraham (called the great promise," which had its fulfilment in Christ), Gen. 12: 3-7; to Isaac, Gen. 26: 3-4; to Jacob, Gen. 28: 14; to David, II. Sam. 7: 12; Ps. 89: 3, 4, 35, 36; see also the promises of Christ, John 14: 13; Matt. 18: 20, and several other passages. There are numerous promises. 2. There may be different opinions as to the degrees of greatness of some of the women of the Bible. We give a list from which you can make your own selection: Sarah, Judith, Leah, Rachel, Thermutis (Pharaoh's daughter), Miriam, Deborah, Naomi, Ruth, the Queen of Sheba, Mary the mother of Christ, Elizabeth, Esther and Rebekah. Some of the women mentioned in the Epistles as having been noted for their piety might be included, as Eunice, Lois, Dorcas, and others.

A. E. S., Portersville, O. Tell something about Korea's form of government and attitude toward missions.

Korea was until recently an independent monarchy with a ruler of its own. Now it has been annexed by Japan and will be ruled as a province of that empire. Its Emperor will be a pensioner of the Japanese government with no authority whatever. The former government had become friendly to missionary work.

D. C. B., Rochester, N. Y. Is not a United States Senator just as much a member of Congress as a Representative? If so, why is it not proper to speak of the former as a Congressman?

Congress is the general name for our representative assemblies in Washington—the Senate and the House of Representatives. It is the custom to speak of a member of the Senate as a Senator, probably because it is a title of greater dignity and because members of Senates in ancient nations were so called. Strictly speaking, the members of the House of Representatives should be called Representatives, but it is an awkward word and custom has given the title of Congressman to a member. It would not be correct to speak of a Senator as a Congressman, the term being only used for the members of the Lower House. Good usage declares otherwise.

A. L., Newport, Vt. What is the hair-tailed fish?

It is a fish with a long bundlelike body, tapering to a point. The dorsal fin extends the entire length of the back. The ventral fins are either very small or absent altogether. It is only found in tropical waters. The best specimens come from the West Indies.

J. C. G., Westgrove, Pa. Where in the Bible do people find authority for saying some will occupy higher seats in heaven than others?

See I. Cor. 15: 41. Paul is here explaining the glory of the celestial bodies, not with the purpose of showing different degrees of glory among the redeemed, yet in a manner which clearly conveys an impression of such a difference. See also Matt. 20: 21, where the sons of Zebedee asked to be preferred in the kingdom of Christ. The Master's answer may be regarded as implying that there would be degrees of reward in the future life. There are many passages in both the Old and New Testaments which justify this conclusion. See Ps. 58: 11; Matt. 2: 5-16; 10: 41; I. Cor. 3: 8, and other passages. As there are to be "many mansions," so we may be assured that there will be many stages and degrees of merit in the heavenly life. Those who, by their course of action, have not deserved commendation cannot hope to receive or win high places hereafter, nor will the careless and indolent be put on a plane with those who have been zealous and active workers for God and humanity.

Reader, Norwalk, Conn. Will you do me the kindness to inform me where I may find in the Bible the authority for saying masses for the departed dead? What Scripture is there to lead one to suppose that it is proper to offer prayers for the dead, and for the repose of their souls?

The custom of saying prayers for the dead is not Scriptural. It arose in the Church at an early period. Such prayers, many authorities hold, imply a belief in purgatory, which all Protestants absolutely reject. At first, such prayers were little more than a thanksgiving, a commendation of the souls of the deceased to the mercy of God, and a commemoration of their spiritual worth; but gradually the idea of purgatory grew as a result of the abuse of this custom. All Protestants hold that prayers are not to be offered for the dead, their spiritual welfare being already accomplished. There is no Biblical authority for such prayers.

L. C., Riverhead, N. Y. 1. How many languages are there in the world? 2. How many people use the English language? What language is used most next to ours?

1. There are said to be 3,424 spoken languages or dialects in the world; 1,624 in America, 937 in Asia, 587 in Europe and 276 in Africa. 2. The English is spoken by over 150,000,000 people. 3. German comes next in order to English, being used by over 120,000,000.

J. T. D., Sidney, O. What causes the wind to blow?

Winds are the result of differences in atmospheric pressure, the winds moving from a place of high barometric pressure to places of lower pressure. See article in any good encyclopedia on winds.

E. M. D., Green Bay, Wis. Please tell me what became of Arent Van Vroom in the story of the "Strawberry Handkerchief," in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Also who Lady Rose Harley married.

These were subordinate characters, so Mr. Barr did not tell us definitely what became of them. It is strongly implied in the last chapter that he sailed away in his ship to join Rose Harley, but whether she bestowed her hand upon him at last we do not know.

Mrs. M. W., Foss, Okla. 1. How does the Greek Church baptize? 2. Where is the National Soldiers' Home in Tennessee?

1. It is stated in McClintock and Strong's Biblical Encyclopedia that "the Greek Church requires trine (threefold) immersion in its rubrics, but in Russia baptism by sprinkling or affusion is regarded as equally valid." 2. There is a National Soldiers' Home at Johnson City, Tenn.

R. L., Zanesville, O. What are the world's ten leading cities in point of population?

They are as follows: London, 7,537,196; New York, 4,766,883; Paris, 2,714,068; Tokyo, 2,085,160; Berlin, 2,040,148; Chicago, 1,698,575; St. Petersburg, 1,678,000; Vienna, 1,674,957; Canton, 1,600,000; Pekin, 1,600,000.

G. H., Duluth, Minn. 1. Explain Gen. 27: 40. 2. What is the public debt at present?

1. The whole address beginning with verse 39 should be taken into consideration. The patriarch predicts in the first part that Esau and his descendants should be settled in an arid region, and then in verse 40 refers to the roving life they would lead as freebooters and hunters. The second part of the verse is explained by the fact that though Esau was no personally a subject of his brother, his descendants were vassals of the Israelites from the time of David (II. Sam. 8: 14) till the reign of Joram, when they rose in revolt and had a king of their own. (II. Kings 8: 20.) 2. The public debt of the United States in 1909 was $2,661,426,301.04.

C. D., Belmar, N. J. What is the difference in the hours from here to Jerusalem, Palestine?

When it is 12 o'clock noon at New York it is 8 P.M. in Jerusalem.

R. T. A., Jamestown, R. I. What is meant by "log-rolling" in politics?

It is a term for legislative combinations. In the early days the settlers helped one another to clear their land by rolling off the logs. When the supporters of two or more measures in a legislature combined to help each other on their especial measures it was called "log-rolling."

H. J., Alameda, Calif. Can you tell me from what language the name of the State of Oregon is derived and what it means?

Most historians agree that the name must come from the Spanish oregones, meaning "the big-eared men." It was a term applied by the Jesuit missionaries to the Indians of western and southwestern North America.

E. J. P., Altoona, Pa. What is meant by "Church Federation in America"? Where can I get printed literature on the subject? What is the distinction between "the sons of God" and the "daughters of men"?

The "sons of God" are believed by commentators to have been the descendants of Seth, while the "daughters of men" were Cainites or carnal women. Write to Rev. Dr. Sanford, Bible House, New York, for literature regarding Church federation. Federation does not involve a change of creed, or a surrender of denomination, but merely union and co-operation in Christian work and Gospel effort, waiving all non-essential differences.

H. S. P., Lansdown, Pa. 1. When did Jean Ingelow, authoress and poetess, die? 2. Where and when was she born?

1. She died in 1897. 2. She was born at Boston, in Lincolnshire, England, in 1820.

H. H. M., Newport, R. I. 1. I have read in accounts of the Roman Eucharist Congress at Montreal that three cardinals were present, the largest number ever on American soil. How many cardinals are there? 2. Are most of them Italians?

1. There are in the College of Cardinals five cardinal bishops and forty-three cardinal priests. 2. There are twenty-two Italian cardinals, the rest being divided among ten other nationalities.

E. D., Butte, Mont. 1. If a young man joins the navy, how long does he serve on one enlistment? 2. How old must one be to join the service?

1. The term of enlistment is four years. 2. Boys under eighteen, with the consent of parents or guardians, enlist for their minority. Boys under eighteen can sometimes enlist by securing the consent of the Navy Department.

P. S., Harrisburg, Pa. How many merchant vessels of all kinds were built in the United States during the last year, and what was the total tonnage?

In 1909, the total number of vessels constructed was 1,247. The total tonnage was 238,090.

A. L., Halifax, N. S. 1. How many people are there in the employ of the United States Government? 2. How many employees in the public service in Washington?

1. According to the Government Blue Book for last year there were 370,065 employees. 2. There were in Washington 28,047 employees in the various departments.

L. I., Troy, N. Y. Is it considered wrong for third cousins to marry?

There is no prohibition in Scripture as to such a marriage. The Church of England, in 1563, set forth by authority a table, drawn up by Archbishop Parker, stating the degrees of relationship in which marriages were forbidden.

W. H. A., Albuquerque, N. M. In reading Helper's Impending Crisis, a book first published in 1857, I find these beautiful lines:

"I would not have a slave to till my ground;
To carry me, to fan me while I sleep
And tremble when I wake, for all the wealth
That sinews bought and sold have ever earned."

Will you please give the name of the author?

It is from a poem by Cowper, the English poet.

B. A. R., Medina, Okla. 1. What is the greatest event recorded in history? 2. Did Christ expel the money-changers and dove-sellers because of their dishonesty or because the temple was not the place of barter?

1. It depends upon the point of view. In the physical sense, it may have been the flood; in a spiritual sense, the Advent of the Redeemer. 2. They were driven out because the Lord's house was desecrated by their buying and selling. There was a regular market in the temple where wine, salt, oil, etc., were sold, and money-changers did a brisk business in converting the current Greek and Roman money into Jewish coins in which alone the temple dues could be paid. The word translated "thieves" is more literally "robbers"—men banded together for gain or plunder regardless of principle. (See Jer. 7: 11.)

S. M., DeSoto, Wis. Jesus said it would be more tolerable for Sodom in the day of judgment than for Capernaum, and the other cities in which he preached. If Sodom will have a chance to repent in the day of judgment, does Jesus imply that the people of to-day will still have a chance to repent in the day of judgment?

He meant that the ancient "cities of the plain," wicked as they were, had never had the Gospel preached to them by the Son of God, as Capernaum and the Jewish cities had. Jesus, during the whole period of his Galilean ministry, made his abode at Capernaum. It had seen the light and deliberately rejected it. The same application could logically be made to modern cities, which all hear the Gospel and reject it. There is nothing said of repentance in the day of judgment.

P. P. McK., Tampa, Fla. 1. How much salary does Diaz, President of Mexico, receive? 2. Who is the Vice-President of Mexico?

1. The President of Mexico receives $50,000 a year. 2. The Vice-President of Mexico is Senor Don Ramon Corral.

M. W. C., Seattle, Wash. I understand that Thomas Jefferson frequently referred to consanguineous marriages in Europe as being productive of imbecile or defective children. Is this why cousins are prohibited from marrying in many States? If so, would it not extend to second cousins also, who are blood relation?

Intermarriage, or the union of those related by blood, is regarded in all civilized countries as objectionable, the offspring of such unions being frequently mentally and physically defective. Marriages between cousins are objected to for this reason, but we know of no statutory objection to second cousins marrying.

D. F. E., New Paltz. 1. Jesus accused the Jews of having slain their prophets. Can you tell me the names? 2. I have always understood that the men selected for the revision of the Bible were noted for their scholarship. How is it that people of ordinary abilities claim that these translators were wrong in so many places?

1. It is evident, from several passages (see II. Chron. 36: 15, 16, Neh. 9: 26, Matt. 5: 12; 21: 35-39; 23: 29-32, Acts 7:51-59), that there must have been many prophet-martyrs in pre-Christian days, but their names (while some may be mentioned in the Jewish books) are not to be found in the Bible, nor yet in Josephus, the historian. 2. The early translators and revisers were men of distinguished scholarship, but they had not the facilities nor the valuable information that later revisers have enjoyed. King James' revisers knew nothing of the three great MSS.—the Sinaitic, the Vatican and the Alexandrine Codex—which have been at the service of the later workers. Besides, the last twenty years have brought to light many valuable inscriptions, which have greatly helped. 3. A course in elocution should be a part of the ministerial training, which would overcome the defect mentioned.

I. A. E., Juniata, Pa. If the vaccine be pure, there is no danger. It is considered necessary in all cities to vaccinate as a preventive of smallpox.

E. G., Milwaukee, Wis. Many of the prophecies are yet to be fulfilled and the proportion stated is probably as near the mark as any, but no one can dogmatize on the subject. The last you mention has reference to the millennium.

Among the many touching letters received from contributors to our children's work at Mont-Lawn, one of the most pathetic is the following from Mrs. Edith W. Fadding, State Line, Mass., who sends $3 for the Home. She writes: "In loving memory of little Ewing Jay Fadding, four and one-half years old, who died May 7, 1909. Seventeen cents of this money was carried by the little fellow from here to Boston, where he went for a surgical operation. Four days later the pocket-book was returned with his lifeless little form. Not wishing to keep it as a talent hid in a napkin, we are sending it forth with God's help to brighten some other little life. His brother and sisters have contributed the rest of the $3 to send some little child to Mont-Lawn."

AMONG THE WORKERS

—THE ADANA Massacre Relief Committee of the Armenian Evangelical Church of New York, Paul S. Iskiyan, president, has closed its work. Altogether fifty-five cases of clothing were shipped by the committee. Fifty cases were shipped from Canada. $282 in cash was sent by the committee for distribution by the missionaries.

REV. JOHN A. STOOKE, of the new Missionary Home at Chefoo, China, writes: "There is a large dining-room at the New Missionary Home named the American CHRISTIAN HERALD Room, which was provided through gifts sent us five years ago, by the honored and beloved editor of this paper, the late Dr. Louis Klopsch. As the years pass by one is made to see the great and lasting benefit these Homes of Rest are in dry and thirsty lands. We are a very happy family this year; denominational distinctions have no part nor lot in our circle. We belong to the various churches in America and the old home countries who join to serve the Master."

—REV. THOMAS LANE, the famous English evangelist, is about to revisit the United States. He has been invited by Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman to help him in the Chicago evangelistic work in October. He sails for New York September 28 and will preach in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church on Sunday, October 9, and then proceed during the week following to Chicago.

MAKES AND BURNS ITS OWN GAS

Reward of Loving Service*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IT is usual when this lesson is studied to consider the "talents" as gifts which people possess in varying degree; some being more gifted than others, according to the scale of one, two and five. We believe a true interpretation is to take the man going into another country as representing Christ, returning to his heavenly home and leaving the church which he founded while he was on earth to the care of his disciples, first to the apostles, and then to their successors, those who in all passing time should have the responsibility of the church.

Dr. Alexander McLaren says: "The talents themselves are the spiritual knowledge and endowments which are properly the gifts of the ascended Lord to his Church." He also says: "The natural gifts called by the name talents are not what Christ means here, though the principles of the parable may be extended to include them."

The Stewardship of the Churches

In a way we might consider the churches as the servants who are to render an account of their stewardship when the Lord and Master returns.

Each church has in it all kinds of people; some are born leaders, others are good fellow helpers. There are many kinds of churches. Some have great prominence in cities, others are located in country districts, and at the crossroads; others are on the frontiers of civilization, and still others are in missionary lands. It would be difficult for us to decide which of these are the five, the two, the one talent churches. It would seem to us that the missionary church has the larger gift of responsibility. In the United States and England the average Christian parish is said to number 1,000 persons, while in India it is said the average parish of every missionary is 155,500 people. (Lucy E. Guinness in New Year's Eve, 1900.) But the wealthy city church has the responsibility of money and influence to exert for the spread of the Gospel, and every church in every town and hamlet has a like responsibility according to its gifts. And every individual in each one of these churches has his or her own responsibility in the matter. Instead of leaving three servants to manage his great spiritual estate, the Church, Jesus has given thousands of thousands the opportunity to work upon it and develop it.

When Jesus spoke the parable of the talents he said: "A man going into a far country called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, to another one, each according to his several ability; and he went on his journey." Then Jesus told what those three servants did; "He that received the five talents went and traded with them, and made other five talents; he also that received the two gained other two. But he that received the one, went away and digged in the earth and hid his lord's money."

The End of It All

And what was the end of it all? Jesus said: "After a long time the lord of those servants cometh, and maketh a reckoning with them. He that received the five talents came and brought other five talents, and he that had received two talents brought other two talents. To each of these the master said, 'Well done, good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will set thee over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." And Jesus said: "He that received one talent came and brought back only that which had been given to him, and with it only unkind and unjust words for his master, and telling him that he had buried the talent that he might have it all to give back to him. Then the master took the talent away from him, and gave it to the servant who had done the most, to him who had gained five talents."

Some writers have classed the twelve apostles according to the three kinds of servants in Jesus' parable. Plainly John, Peter, Matthew and Paul might be called five-talent men, and Judas Iscariot the one-talent man. It would be interesting to study the history of the Christian Church, and so classify its best known preachers, writers and workers. We make the suggestion, and leave you to make out the lists for yourselves. Do it by beginning with men now living, and work backward to those who lived in former times. Those who can be put in such a list are the true "immortals." We will not suggest that you make a list of those who correspond with the man who rendered back his one talent.

One-Talented Servants

John Wesley once said: "Say not that thou hast royal blood in thy veins, and art born of God, except thou canst prove thy pedigree by daring to be holy in spite of men and devils." A truly noble boy or man, girl or woman will have much enthusiasm for the Father's business, which is loving care for all who need. Those who would be like the five and two-talent servants will all the while be on the outlook for something to do to help somebody in his name. But the one-talent servants will be found among those who are always making excuses for themselves.

One Sunday morning a minister preached to an audience of about six hundred persons. Almost all of them were members of the church. Before the sermon he appealed to them in behalf of a mission Sunday School, in which there were a thousand children, and stated that there was an urgent need of at least twenty additional teachers at once. He said if there were some who felt they could not give themselves permanently to the work, it would be a great help if they would go for two or three Sabbaths, until permanent teachers could be secured. What was the result of that appeal? There was not one response! The pastor mentioned the sad and shameful lack of response to a number of persons. With one accord they all excused themselves on the ground that they supposed that there would be so many volunteers that there would be no need for them to go. Evidently they were all the one-talent sort. And if the mission school did not have to be abandoned for lack of teachers, it was because there were some already there who applied themselves all the more diligently to meet the situation.

A Family of Church Workers

Place in contrast to this incident a certain family, consisting of a father, mother and two sons, all members of a church, in which there were several hundred families, and sixteen hundred Sunday School scholars. And yet among them all, this family was pre-eminent for their abundance of good works. One day their appreciative pastor asked them how it occurred to them to do so many things for the church. The reply was made by the father, who said: "Every morning at breakfast I ask the question, 'What can we do for the church to-day?' It very rarely happens that any one of us must answer nothing, but on the contrary, more is suggested than we can possibly do."

A Chance To Earn More!

IT is estimated that a city of 10,000 spends about $5,000 a year for magazines. 30% of that amount ($1,500) is paid to certain persons who secure some of these subscriptions for the publishers. These amounts vary according to the population.

The Magazine business, therefore, offers unusual opportunities for Men and Women, Boys and Girls, Ministers, Sunday School Teachers and all others who desire to increase their incomes.

Why not control part of the subscription business of your community? It is clean, dignified work, and the best people are now engaged in it.

The Christian Herald is organizing an entirely new agency staff. This live Weekly has never before offered such liberal inducements for this class of work, and the possibilities are really unlimited.

Just think of the large number of people who could be induced to subscribe for The Christian Herald! A little effective work, carefully followed up, would in time enable you to "corner" most of the subscription business of your territory, which would net you a permanent profit aside from your other endeavors. There is no expense—we send everything free. Only spare time required.

Why not take advantage of this opportunity to establish a paying spare-time business for yourself? It may be just the chance you are looking for. It is at least worth investigating, and we urge you to write for particulars of our Subscription Money Plan at once.

Sunday School Lesson

ut all persons are not as resourceful in their plans. They need somebody to plan for them. And this, pastor and Sunday School teachers should do for them. One pastor had a leaflet printed and distributed both in church and Sunday School, with the following items on it:

I can and will regularly attend the Sunday morning service.

I will come a little ahead of time for a moment of silent, preparatory prayer.

I can and will keep Bibles in my pew or bring one with me, to follow the Scripture reading.

I can and will join heartily in the singing of the hymns.

I will memorize the text of the sermon.

I will cheerfully give the ushers a part of my pew for strangers when necessary.

I will greet strangers, and invite them to come again, or ask them to make a church home with us.

I will teach a class in Sunday School when needed.

I will be a helpful Sunday School scholar by seeking to keep up the interest in my class by regular attendance; by preparatory study of the lesson by joining heartily in all the singing and responsive reading and other general exercises, and by bringing in new scholars.

. I will attend the young people's prayer-meeting, or the regular prayer-meeting of the church.

. I will make special effort to get young persons to attend the Sunday evening service.

. I will devote three hours each week to making calls for the church on the sick, the poor, the strangers, or on members of the Sunday School whom the teachers are unable to visit.

. I will encourage good reading for myself and others by taking books out of the Sunday School or church library.

The Need of Personal Work

The necessity for such a circular of direction will be shown by the following incident. A pastor was urging the need of personal work on the part of his members to help the efficiency of the preaching services. One man asked, "What would you have us do? I think I am ready to do any kind of work I am fitted for." The pastor replied: "Perhaps you are already doing all you can, but what is your plan?" "Oh, I don't know that I have any plan. I just do what comes to hand from day to day." "Very good," said the pastor, "but suppose you tell how many men you have tried to influence for Christ during the past year. Have you personally spoken to one about his salvation?" "Well, no, I can't say that I have." "How many families live on the same block of houses with yourself?" "One hundred, perhaps." "How many of them do you know?" "Not more than three." "Do you know whether or not they all go to church?" "I certainly know that many of them do not." "Have you ever, during the past year, tried by personal invitation or otherwise to get them to go with you to the house of God?" "No; I am not acquainted with them." "And therefore you are willing to leave them to carelessness, sin, and possibly the loss of their souls, and would count that a sufficient reason to give to the Master in the day of judgment for not speaking to them." The man saw himself in a new light—as a hinderer of the Gospel. We certainly can not class him among the five, nor the two-talent servants. Neither do we like to say that he was a one-talent servant, but certainly he was hiding the treasure of his Master. Let us hope that the arousement which he received from his pastor quite made him over into just the sort of a helper the Lord would delight in.

Some Selfish Christians

Mr. D. L. Moody said: "Some Christians have a selfish religion; they think they are safe themselves, and they have no desire to reach out after other people. You talk with them, and the root of the matter is in them, but we want something else beside roots. The idea of a man having a garden, and growing nothing but roots! It would be a fine garden, would it not, without any trees and branches and flowers? Miss Smiley once said to me: 'Many of God's people are pot-bound.' 'Pot-bound?' I said; 'what do you mean by that?' She took me into a hot-house, and drawing out of a pot a geranium plant by the roots she said, 'Don't you see the pot is so full of roots that there is no room for the earth or soil in which the plant can grow? You can see that it has not grown for a long time; it is pot-bound.'"

Admires All the Premiums

I WISH to acknowledge with many thanks the receipt of your two beautiful premiums for securing six subscriptions under your special offer: Hero Tales and The Wedding Ring. The premiums are gems and will find prominent place in my library. I would not miss getting them and am enjoying reading them very much. Recently, I received as premiums from you for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the beautiful flag and picture of the Presidents which I also highly prize. I have been taking THE HERALD for quite a while and enjoy reading every one of its brimming, interesting pages. In my long experience in literature and journalism I have never known a paper to be more generous to and thoughtful of its patrons than THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

DON'T BE ANONYMOUS

WE have received lately a number of communications from friends who have written us concerning various advertisements which have appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, some by way of criticism and some merely by way of comment. In several of these cases we would have liked to have offered an explanation, but were unable to do so because our correspondents did not sign name and address.

We must ask our friends always to sign name and address to letters. We do not object to criticism. We invite it. And therefore you must have no hesitancy about signing your name. The only way in which we can be sure to produce a paper which will suit our subscribers is for those subscribers to take interest enough in it to let us know whether they are pleased or not.

We endeavor to answer all letters that require a reply and in a number of cases we have found that our readers were laboring under a misconception when they wrote to us criticising one feature or another. By giving us a chance to reply, you may enable us to clear away a misunderstanding which might never be explained if you addressed us anonymously.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

Where Children Are Fed with Oatmeal

Among the homes of the educated—on the boulevards, in the higher-class sections and university districts—an actual canvass shows that seven in eight regularly serve oatmeal.

Among the homes of the ignorant—in the tenement districts—not one home in twelve serves oats.

The use of oatmeal depends on knowledge, not money. Quaker Oats—the finest of all—costs but one-half cent per dish.

It is where people know best what brains and bodies require that one finds the oatmeal homes.

Some Statistics

Here are some facts which we have discovered by an actual canvass, employing 130 men.

Four-fifths of all the college students came from oatmeal homes. So did two-thirds of the teachers of children.

Most of the leaders in every walk of life had oatmeal as a childhood food. President Taft is among them.

But only one in thirteen of the inmates of poorhouses was brought up on oatmeal. Only two per cent. of the prisoners in four great penitentiaries came from oatmeal homes.

Among physicians, 8 in 10 regularly serve oatmeal. Among college professors, 48 in 50 eat it. The finest hotels serve one pound of oatmeal daily to each 18 guests, on the average.

But, in the lowliest vocations—where brains count least—the oatmeal users are exceedingly rare.

It is everywhere apparent that the use of oatmeal is everywhere in direct proportion to the average intelligence.

The Premier Food

A great English educator says that 90% of a child's fitness is fixed before it enters a school. And that fitness depends largely on food.

Oats are the greatest of all foods, especially for the years of growth.

They are richer than all other cereals in proteid, the body-builder in organic phosphorus, the brain-builder—in lecithin, the builder of nerves.

No other food is so well-balanced as oats—so fitted for creating both brain and brawn.

The use of oatmeal is almost universal among those who know these facts.

Quaker Oats

The Utmost in Oatmeal

The oats used in Quaker Oats are selected by 62 separate siftings. We pick out only the richest, plumpest grains, and get but ten pounds of Quaker Oats from a bushel.

From these we create, by a perfect process, the finest oat food in existence. It is the kind that children love—the delicious kind which you will always want when you compare it with common oatmeal.

Quaker Oats, because of its lusciousness, has become the leading oat food the world over.

The Postal Life Insurance Company dispenses with agents: it thus saves for policyholders where others spend

When you come to think it over—

Why should it be necessary for a life-insurance agent to persuade a man to insure his life.

Why should a man have to be argued into making provision for his family in case his chair becomes vacant?

And finally, having been persuaded and argued into taking out a policy, why should he allow his premium-money to be split up and a part of it handed over to the agent?

Why should the man pay the middleman?

He does pay him, not only out of the first premium but out of every renewal premium for years after—and he pays collection fees, too—for collecting from himself.

If you're buying a staple like life-insurance, isn't it good business to fight shy of agency companies, however large, that maintain and nourish middlemen at the expense of policyholders?

Isn't it sensible to deal direct with a sound, progressive non-agency company?

Why not write to the POSTAL?

It has ample resources to meet every demand now and in the future; it issues all the standard forms of legal-reserve policies, only it issues them direct, thus effecting important economies of which its policyholders get the benefit.

Here are four features that strongly commend the POSTAL LIFE:

1. GUARANTEED DIVIDENDS: 9½% paid to policyholders annually from savings because of the elimination of agents' commissions, and agency expenses.
2. CONTINGENT DIVIDENDS: Made up and paid annually from other sources, these contingent dividends being in addition to the guaranteed dividends and larger than other companies pay.
3. LIBERAL OPTIONS AND VALUES: Enabling you, among other things, to add to the face-value of your policy a larger amount of paid-up insurance than is possible in any other company.
4. OPTIONAL PREMIUM PRIVILEGE: Permitting policyholders to deposit premiums monthly, quarterly, semi-annually or annually as desired and without consulting the Company.

It will pay you to find out what the Company will do for you PERSONALLY. Just write and say: "Mail me particulars about insurance in the POSTAL LIFE as per Christian Herald advertisement," and be sure to state:

1. Your occupation
2. The exact date of your birth

COMPOUND INTEREST

"GREAT oaks from little acorns grow," quoted a well-known millionaire recently. "You may add," he continued, "that great fortunes are made from small interest."

"Get six per cent., my son, and get it long enough," said the elder Vanderbilt, "and in time you will own all the money in the world." He might have added, "and all the rest of the world's wealth."

We are led to quote these aphorisms of successful business men, because we have frequently received letters from subscribers who have complained of the "low rate" of interest sometimes yielded from investments. But the potential power of compound interest to swell the volume of principal is not understood by many, who have not taken the trouble to calculate the results.

What is Interest?

As every one familiar with business knows, and those who are not familiar should know, interest is the amount paid per annum for the use of money. If we paid for the use of a house we should call the compensation "rent"; if for the use of personal services, "wages," or "salary." Money saved represents the labor and self-denial of the owner. He has earned it and it is his to do with as he pleases. He can lock it up in a trunk or other place of safety, and at the end of twenty years he may take it out, and, counting it, he will find the exact number of dollars, and not a cent more than he first put away. That money lay barren; it drew no interest. It in no way added to the owner's wealth or to the available capital of the business world.

Now let us suppose the amount locked up in the trunk to be $100, and the owner to be a man of faith and foresight, who knew something of the fertility of interest: Would he hide his money away? Every reader will respond, with emphasis: "Surely not!"

Interest Breeds Principal

In New York, and in many other States, the legal rate of interest is six per cent.; that is, no higher rate can be charged without subjecting the lender to the charge of usury. If the hundred dollars we are considering were invested in a mortgage paying six per cent. semi-annually, it would earn three dollars every six months, six dollars at the end of the first year. As soon as interest is paid, it at once becomes capital, exactly like its parent, the original hundred, and as such it is ready for investment. For convenience sake, we call interest on interest, "compound interest." It differs only from the original investment in the manner in which it was earned.

If the interest, three dollars, at the end of the first six months, be reinvested at the same rate, the sum of the interest and its compound will be not $106, but $106.09, the nine cents being the net from compounding.

Now take your pencil and sit down and do some figuring, and you will surprise yourself by seeing that original sum growing before your eyes like the rolling snowball, the increase coming from the ceaseless accumulations of interest and interest on interest.

Progressive Compound Interest

If you study this question a while, you will discover that there is simple compound interest, and what is known as "progressive compound interest." To illustrate the first: If you deposit, let us say, one dollar in a savings bank that pays four per cent. semi-annually, and let it compound, it will, at the end of twenty years, grow to two dollars and nineteen cents. Now deposit one dollar a year for twenty years at the same rate of interest, and you will find the sum increased progressively to thirty dollars and ninety-seven cents.

You must not suppose that this increase, through interest accumulations, is an entirely automatic matter, like the common slot machine. The self-denial, care and forethought that led to the first accumulation must be persistently continued through the productive years. The saving habit must be kept up, and this may be done nearly every case, without any neglect of duty to others. This accumulative growth suggests the magic lamp of Arabian Nights, the rubbing of which brought all things wished for to the owner.

A Rainy Day Protection

Benjamin Franklin's adage: "The care of the pennies and the pounds will take care of themselves," is as true to-day as it was when written a century and a half ago. Five cents a day deposited in a savings bank for ten years, will amount to one hundred and eighty-two dollars and fifty cents. With interest and compound interest growing accumulatively, the sum, at the end of the time named, would be one hundred and twenty-two dollars and fifty-six cents, and this at the daily sacrifice of a cheap cigar or a glass of soda water.

Ten cents a day saved, and invested in this way, will grow in ten years to four hundred and forty-five dollars and thirty-six cents. Fifteen cents in the same way, will grow to six hundred and sixty-eight dollars and eighty cents, and twenty cents will increase to eight hundred and ninety dollars and ninety-nine cents.

It is not necessary to carry out this illustration through increased savings, but it can be seen that it is within the power of every wage-earner, possessed of the commendable spirit of many thrift and character-building self-denial, to make provision for the inevitable rainy day, and the increasing incapacity of declining years.

There are few if any wage-earners who can deposit at the rate of a dollar a day for ten years, but there are certainly many men on fine salaries who might do so. In such a case the principal and accumulations would amount to four thousand four hundred and fifty-five dollars and seventy-five cents. This would buy a good farm or a comfortable house in town, while if allowed to remain in the savings bank, the interest, as a source of income, would amount to one hundred and seventy-eight dollars and twenty-one cents, or nearly fifteen dollars a month.

A Hint To Depositors

Of course, the greater the deposits the greater will be the increase, but our purpose is to show how through small deposits and a low rate of interest, regularly and accumulatively compounded, it is possible for every toiler to secure a competency before he reaches the age of fifty, provided always that he begin as soon as he is his own master and stick to it till success is achieved.

Nearly all savings banks calculate their interest from the first of the year till the end of June, and from that time till the end of the year. It is a rule, and we think a wise one, not to pay interest for fractions of the half year. A man whose interest is payable on July 1 will not be entitled to interest if he draws out his money before June 30. If he has two thousand dollars in the savings bank, and he wants to use one thousand dollars for thirty days, it is clear that he will lose twenty dollars if he draws that one thousand dollars out. To avoid this he can take his deposit book to any bank and, leaving it as security for his note, get the one thousand. Say he pays six per cent. for this accommodation, he will save the twenty that would come from the savings bank by paying five for the loan, and so is fifteen dollars ahead.

Burns, in his "Advice to a Young Friend," says:

Gather gold by every means that's justified by honor,
Not to hide it in a trunk, nor for a tran-tendant,
But for the glorious privilege of living, independent.

Young People's Societies

Planning Great Things*

ONE of the most thrilling watch-words of history is the brave injunction which Carey, the great Father of Modern Missions, gave to his co-workers and to those who should come after them: "Expect great things of the Lord."

Most of us have the courage, in the beginning of our Christian life, to expect these great things; but "the early dew of morning is passed away by noon."

We are all too apt to grow timid or soured after a few discouragements. Our expectations become mean and low. Our Christian life is likely to lapse into sluggishness and death in consequence.

This is vitally wrong. To the very last we must keep that abiding hope to which God calls his children. It is the source of strength and progress. The chained lions in the Pilgrim's Progress are an apt figure to express the way in which our foolish fears paralyze and hamper us, and all for nothing.

There is no more inspiring chapter in the Bible than that of our text, in which Moses is reproved because of his lack of confidence in God.

"Why criest thou to me? Go forward."

He looked desperate, to be sure. Go forward?—when before them stretched the deep expanse of the Red Sea?

Yet there are many among us, who, depending upon the Lord, have gone forward facing equal problems, and have been led through them, almost as miraculously as the Israelites were led through the parted waters.

"The result of high character," says Miss Elizabeth Hills Lyman, "is true happiness. Speaking in the manner of allegory, we set forth from the town of Character and travel the road of Commonplace Duties, until we come to a swift-flowing river. Here are boulders. Wrestling with these, we develop strength, and so cross the river by the noble bridge of Power, of which indeed the very obstructing boulders become the piers. Then it is that we enter the field of Happiness, and find our heart's-ease and forget-me-nots. Character, Power, Happiness. This is the true order of life."

There was never a juster estimate of the mode by which we must progress. First, the great foundation—right-control living, with all the patient, hard striving which that implies. Gradually, character forms—then reputation follows. Insensibly power is felt, and power rightly used brings the nearest approach to happiness that human life affords.

And let us not regret the stings and blows of life. They are the boulders of which Mrs. Lyman speaks. They call forth our strength and compel us to move forward.

One of our great poets has said:

> Then welcome each rebuff,
> That turns earth's smoothness rough,
> Each sting that bids nor sit nor stand, but go.
> . . .
> . . . it was better, youth
> Should strive through acts uncouth
> Toward making, than repose on aught found made.

The reason why we are slow and dull, says George Matheson, is because, though we see the visible universe around us yielding to inexorable law, man resists the will of the Eternal.

"Why should he be allowed to resist? Why does not God put down his insane rebellion and crush his proud will into conformity with the universal chorus? The Bible gives the answer. It is because love is incompatible with the exercise of omnipotence."

Therefore with loving kindness has he drawn us. Let us not grieve over our slow progress. If our hearts are right with God, he will draw us to him by the sure cords of his love.

Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, October 9. TEXT: Ex. 14:9-15.

Repentance and Restoration*

A DISTINGUISHED minister has recently remarked that children brought up in religious families and entering naturally into the church during their teens, have the misfortune to know little of repentance.

It is as if these young people were born Christians. In the properly conducted Christian home, it is taken for granted that the children all stand on the Lord's side, and that as soon as they are old enough to declare themselves, they will openly enlist themselves in his army. Thus they lead the Christian life as it were from infancy, knowing only that kind of repentance which follows unpremeditated and unintentional sin.

But the vast majority of mankind are not thus fortunate. They are born into homes of sin, or at least of indifference. By some good providence, certain among them are arrested in their course; they are shown as by a sudden bright light, such as illumined Paul's path on his way to Damascus, the foulness and hideousness of their sins; the Spirit, while it reveals their infirmities, shows them also a way of escape; they believe, are forgiven and accepted, and there is joy in the kingdom of heaven. As one of our texts says, there come seasons of refreshing when sin is blotted out from the soul.

Gipsy Smith, in his great sermon on repentance, confesses that when he came to Christ, "it was a warfare—it was cutting off the right arm and plucking out the right eye. It meant coming out, being forsaken, abused, slandered, despised, persecuted. But now it is easy, though Jesus himself never made it easy. One man came and asked, 'Are there few that be saved?' And Jesus answered, 'Agonize to enter in at the strait gate.' Another man said, 'Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest.' But Jesus knew that he had not counted the cost, and said, 'Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.'"

He did not make it easy.

It was the same way with Nicodemus—the same with the rich young man; both of them were given something hard to do, to prove the reality of their repentance.

Even though our young people come into their Christian life naturally and normally, there is still much that is hard and distasteful to do in order to cement the bond between them and Christ.

Repentance means not simply mental and spiritual sorrowing for sin; it means a complete turning from it.

Mr. Moody tells of a woman who tried to pray; but every time she began a prayer, there came into her mind five bottles of milk that she had stolen, when she was a housekeeper for a wealthy man. He had been long dead, so that she could not ease her mind by making restitution to him.

Mr. Moody advised her to find some one who represented that man's estate, and to give him the value of the stolen goods.

This was a new idea to her. She went back to the town where she had sinned, and found that her employer's son had succeeded to the old home, and to him she made confession. He was unwilling to receive her restitution, but finally consented to do so; and then she knew at last the joy of the restoration which always follows true repentance.

The deed must ever follow the thought, or else the thought is a mere sentimental dissipation. True repentance can end in restoration only when the repentance has extended to the very outer rim of our influence and activity; in other words, to our every act in the home and in our business.

Your Money's Worth in a Watch Case

The reliable watch case, with its tight-fitting caps and neat joints, is a mighty fine piece of workmanship. There are a dozen ways to cheapen it—in amount of labor put on it, in skill, in weight, in fineness.

The genuine watch case is made not merely to please the eye and to sell, but to protect the wonderfully fine and delicate mechanism of the watch movement or "works."

You know how it is in buying anything: if you take things for granted and don't know what to ask for you get an adulterated article—a substitute said to be "just as good" as the genuine.

The trade marks illustrated on this page are your safeguard. They are standard with the fine jewelry trade, and have been for 50 years. They mean absolute integrity in bullion value, in assay, in construction of a watch case. Be sure to find them. Every good jeweler in this country knows the marks and carries the cases. They are made for ladies' and men's watches—plain, engine-turned, engraved or enameled. All sizes, all patterns.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

FROM MY YOUTH UP*

SEVERAL people have been heard to say lately, "My reading in these days consists chiefly of biography and autobiography. I find such books far more interesting than novels."

An enormous number of people must share this feeling, judging from the increasing size of the literary output in the line of biography and autobiography, and by the library statistics of the readers of such works.

Is it because people themselves are constantly becoming more interesting as personalities? Or is it because the art of writing is now carried to a higher pitch of perfection than ever? Who can tell? Surely, every book-reviewer will testify that the biographical books are among the most delightful that come to his table, and that this year's harvest of them is the richest that he has known.

And none among them all excels in interest that beautiful life-story which the beloved Margaret Sangster has given us in her new book, From My Youth Up.

Men and women will alike enjoy and profit by this book. It will be an abnormal person who can willingly lay it down for a moment, having once thrown himself under its spell.

There are few who can write of themselves without betraying egotism, or some other disagreeable intellectual weakness. From My Youth Up is absolutely free from anything of the sort. Its modesty and impersonality are indeed carried almost too far. One would have liked to hear something of the many honors which have been heaped upon Mrs. Sangster; the many assemblies which have been held in her honor; the memberships in great societies which have been tendered to her; the testimonials of great people to the help which has been rendered them by her words, especially by her melodious, true and deep-reaching poems; but she has been mindful, as ever, of the admonitions of Scripture, and acts upon the good old injunction, "Let another praise thee, and not thine own mouth."

The childhood of this daughter of a long line of fighting Covenanters; her sweet girlhood experiences; her war reminiscences; her happy married life in the South; her first essays into the literary and journalistic arenas; her ultimate success, and the wonderful use to which she has put it, working ever for the help of others, and far too little—as all who know her feel—for her own fame, which has come to her almost unsought; all these are vividly sketched for us in this unpretentious volume. Unaffected in style, deeply religious in tone, yet sparkling with quiet humor and reflecting to a remarkable degree the world-spirit of each successive decade through which she has lived, Mrs. Sangster has given us an effective picture of the way in which a home-bred, home-loving woman may enter into public life, refining and uplifting whatever she touches, and making always and everywhere for the glory of God. The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who have long enjoyed the inspiration of Mrs. Sangster's weekly ministrations, will, more thoroughly than any others, enjoy this book, which should be in every home, and especially should be in every Sunday School library.

Sidelights on Religion. By J. Brierley, B.A. The chapters in this book aim to consider religion from the standpoints of the Bible, nature, history, philosophy and politics. Cloth binding. Pp. 286. Price $1.40. Thomas Whittaker, publisher, New York.

The King's Greatest Business. By Paul J. Gilbert, author of Conductor Jim. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. 75 cents. A treatise upon soul winning. Mr. Gilbert has worked in the highways and the byways, bidding men to come to the Master's feast.

The Teaching of the Lesson; A Commentary on the International Sunday School Lessons for the year 1910. By G. Campbell Morgan, D.D. Hodder & Stoughton, New York and London (George H. Doran Company, 35 West Thirty-second Street, American agents). 25 cents.

Story Land. By Clara Murray, author of The Child at Play, Play Time, Story Book Friends, etc. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 50 cents. A pretty volume of tales and verses for children, original and selected, nearly all of them conveying information, and many of them especially suited for Christmas reading.

One Thousand Salads. By Olive Green. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York and London. $1. The recipes in this little book are prefaced by an exhaustive essay upon salads and salad dressings. Cheese dishes, canapes and sandwich fillings are also included. For the modern, up-to-date housewife an invaluable book.

The Salvation of the Little Child. The perils and possibilities of the lives of little children, with suggestions to parents for early training. Pp. 96. Jennings & Graham, Cincinnati.

The Truth of Christianity. By Lieut-Col. W. H. Turton, D. S. O. Four main arguments adduced for Christianity, all probably of equal value, the argument from Miracles, from Prophecy, from Christ's character, and from History. Cloth covers. Pp. 604. Price $1.25. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, publishers.

Christianity at the Cross-Roads. By George Turrell, author of Lex Credendi, etc. Longmans, Green & Co., London and New York. The last essays of this distinguished Roman Catholic writer and preacher. They are especially concerned with the great fact of immortality, in which his faith grew stronger to the very end.

Devotional Hours with the Bible. The Gospel by Matthew. By J. R. Miller, D.D. New York and London: Hodder & Stoughton (George H. Doran Company, American agents). A full exposition of Matthew's Gospel, written in the delightful style for which Dr. Miller has become famous. Exhortation and narrative are joined with explanation, and all students of the first great Gospel will find this volume helpful.

Misery and Its Causes. By Edward T. Devine, Ph.D., LL.D., Schiff Professor of Social Economy, Columbia University; General Secretary of the Charity Organization Society of the City of New York, and Editor of The Survey. New York: The Macmillian Company. $1.25. This valuable study of poverty, with its often resulting distress and crime, is another contribution to the world of philanthropy from the late John S. Kennedy, who established the lectureship from which the material for this book is gleaned.

The Foreigner. A Tale of Saskatchewan. By Ralph Connor, author of The Sky Pilot, The Doctor, The Man from Glengarry, etc. Hodder & Stoughton (New York, George H. Doran Company). $1.50. In this, as in all of this author's stories, right is triumphant, and a good moral is drawn; but the sin which is to be conquered is depicted all too vividly and the development of the plot, as the story approaches its close, blossoms out into wild melodrama. With all its good points, and they are not few, The Foreigner is disagreeable reading, and it is to be hoped that Ralph Connor will use his wonderful descriptive powers to better purpose in his next book.

OLD FOLKS' RALLY DAY

INETEEN years ago, when Rev. Dr. D. H. King, pastor of the irst Presbyterian Church of Vine-nd, N. J., began holding Old Folks' ay services, little attention was paid the aged. Now, the whole State ems to want to honor the old people,

Mrs. Charlotte Campbell
101 years old

d the second Sunday in September is become a grand annual holiday. utomobiles ran to all parts of the wn on September 11 gathering in e septuagenarians, octogenarians, nogenarians and one centenarian. Mrs. Charlotte Campbell, who was the leading figure of the occasion, will be 101 years old in October. As she sped along in the auto, she remarked that it was different from the ox-cart in which she rode to church when a girl. This centenarian has raised ten children and four of her big boys are still living. Once she tied her apron around a tree to keep a bear from coming down until her husband got his gun.

To say that the old folks enjoyed the services does not half convey the joy they expressed. To hear them sing "How Firm a Foundation," with tears streaming down their faces, stirred the whole audience. Dr. King's text was preached to the old folks on "Abide with us; for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent." (Luke 24: 29.) He compared human life to a day, illustrating the morning, noon and night. He pictured a gorgeous sunset and likened the passing of a Christian from earth to such a scene. There were present three persons over ninety, twenty-one over eighty, and sixty over seventy. Commandant John Shields of the Soldiers' Home brought a score of veterans ranging from seventy to ninety-one years. Some of the inmates have eventful histories. The church was festooned with fruits and autumn flowers. Misses Ruth Hanford, Minerva Brown, Etta Gove and Elizabeth Cunningham, little tots in white, distributed souvenirs to all over seventy, bouquets to all over eighty, and the centenarian got a special present.

For a Negro Training Farm

EADERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will remember Jennie S—— out whom this journal published an ticle some time ago. She was the or lame colored girl of Lake City, C., who "wanted to be somebody." hen Jennie came to the Mayesville stitute, she knew absolutely nothing. e took up sewing as a trade, and of urse entered the first grade in the hool, taking a regular educational urse. In three months she was able pass a creditable examination and tered the second grade and she has orked her way steadily up. Now e is in the fourth grade, and along th her studies she has taken up sew-g, first plain, and then dressmaking. w she is able not only to make all r own clothes, but to help others ng. This summer she has spent the tire time in sewing and has sup-rted herself with what she is able earn with her needle. She always ys that she is so glad that she came the Mayesville Institute—that it s done her so much good, and she is ry grateful to THE CHRISTIAN HER-D friends whose generosity provided r her education. She is an active rker in the Christian Endeavor and nday School, and also in the Sun-ine Society.

Jennie has an amiable nature. Once hen one of her classmates was ill, she k it upon herself to keep the fire rning brightly in the invalid's room, d did various other acts of kindness. e says, "Since the Lord has been so od to me, and has done so much for e, I want to show my appreciation by ing something good for others." She very appreciative of the least kind-ss, and it is a great pleasure to be le to help her along. Jennie is a uni-rsal favorite among the students and achers of the institution. In spite of r lameness, she is by far the most eerful girl in the place. THE CHRIS-AN HERALD readers cannot realize at a blessing they have been to this or crippled young girl.

There is probably no worthier work ywhere than that which is now go-g on at the Mayesville Institute. ndreds of poor colored boys and ls are being taught not only the ual branches of study but are being ined in practical industries which will make them respectable, intelligent, self-supporting men and women. This is the real need of the negro youth, who have been too long neglected. So convincing has been the study of the industrial constitution of the colored people and of the means whereby they could best be helped that the management of the Institute has been emphasizing the industrial division of the school work. Miss Emma Wilson, the superintendent, says: "They must be led onward and upward along industrial lines; that is our absolute conclusion to-day. That the work may the better be enhanced along these lines, we have begun negotiations for a farm of 335 acres, which will cost about $22,000. There are five good houses upon it, with a good artesian well, and a splendid orchard. Our work is commended by all who know it. Special Agent Durham, of the Government Department of Commerce and Labor, wrote us that he has not found any work more worthy than ours. With this farm added to the land now belonging to the Institute, we will be in a position to help many of those who cannot help themselves. We have gone along at Mayesville on simple lines, with small means, but with a firm dependence upon the Lord for the supply of all our wants. It has been a work of faith, and our faith has been vindicated by the results; for he has never failed us, nor will he fail us now. We have the same simple faith we had years ago, when we plodded along in our school at Mayesville. We have paved the way for the greater success, which has brought us to this point of our journey.

"The friends of our work, many of them being CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, have confidence in us and I put this matter before them as the greatest nced of the Mayesville Institute at the present time—I mean the opportunity to acquire this land for our industrial work. Its acquisition would be a great blessing and we are looking to our friends to help us."

Better Than Ever!

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is better this year than ever.

Chats With Young Folks

Catching a Thief

THE great artist Gainsborough was born in Sudbury, England, where his father had a large orchard.

Night after night, during harvest time, this orchard was plundered. Search was made for the thief, but he could not be found. Watchers were posted, and though they insisted that they did not sleep, still the fruit mysteriously disappeared.

It was plain that not many could be engaged in the mischievous work. The family concluded that a single skilful rogue was responsible for all their losses; but who could he be?

One day young Gainsborough saw a rough looking man leaning his elbows on the orchard wall. He was gazing steadily at the groups of heavily laden trees.

"He looks like a thief," thought the quick-witted boy. "I believe he is studying to find the best trees to rob to-night. I am going to draw his picture."

Rapidly he sketched the outlines of the suspicious-looking intruder.

Returning home, he showed the picture to his father. With this to guide the searchers, the man was soon arrested. He proved to be the thief.

Naturally, young Gainsborough was delighted at the success of his experiment. As a sort of monument to commemorate his feat, he decided to make a statue of the fruit-robber.

He accordingly cut in wood an image of the man, with his arms folded, as when he had first been seen. Then the boy painted in oils the rough figure and set it up in the spot where the original had first been seen. He named the scarecrow "Jack Peartree."

"This," says his biographer, "was probably Gainsborough's first work in oils."

One day Thicknesse, the distinguished lieutenant-governor of the Landguard Fort near Ipswich, was walking with a friend near the Gainsborough place, when he spied what seemed to be a melancholy-faced countryman, with his arms locked together, leaning against the garden wall.

"He has been there all day, they say," he remarked. "He must be either mad or very miserable."

You can imagine how he laughed when he found that the object of his sympathy was only "Jack Peartree."

He was so much impressed by the genius shown in modeling the rough figure that he hastened to become acquainted with its young sculptor.

A warm friendship sprang up between them which lasted as long as they lived.

How He Knew

DR. DUDLEY LEAVITT for many years made the New Hampshire Almanac, which hung in every farmer's kitchen throughout the State.

One day, as the Springfield Republican relates, he was driving through the town of Nottingham, when he encountered a farmer hoeing.

"It is a fine morning," said Mr. Leavitt.

"Yes, but it is going to rain before long," said the farmer.

Mr. Leavitt considered himself a pretty good weather prophet, and he did not believe that the farmer knew what he was talking about, for there was no hint of rain in the summer sky.

He was therefore much surprised when before he had passed through a road called "the Northwood Narrows," not an hour later, a heavy shower descended upon him.

Wishing to find out how the farmer could predict so exactly, the "sage of the Winnepesaukee," as Mr. Leavitt was often called, turned back to inquire.

The farmer was out in his field again by the time Mr. Leavitt reached it.

"I should like to know," said the almanac maker, "how you could tell that there was going to be rain.

"Well," said the old farmer, havir no idea who his questioner might b "when my old ram scratches his ea with his left hind foot in the mornin I know there will be rain before nigh Besides, if that old fool of a Dudle Leavitt says in his almanac, 'fa weather may be expected to-day,' as noticed he did this morning, I know will be just the contrary."

Mr. Leavitt did not wait to hear ar more.

AN ELEGANT REPRODUCTION OF A BEAUTIFUL

$250,000 PAINTING

TO BE GIVEN AWAY FOR A FAVOR

REQUIRED FIVE YEARS TO PAINT IT---A GREAT OFFER TO REGULAR SUBSCRIBERS AND THEIR FRIENDS

A Copy of "Mona Liza" Should Be in Every Home

PROBABLY no painting has created more wide-spread interest than the "Mona Liza" of Leonardo da Vinci. It has been said, though not authoritatively, that the British Government once offered one million pounds for its possession.

The subject, "Mona Liza," or LaGioconda," as she is sometimes called, was the wife of Gioconda, a Florentine citizen. It was between 1500 and 1506 that she posed for Da Vinci. The execution of this painting took five years, as it was only while seated in a certain posture, and listening to a certain strain of music, that her face took on that peculiarly elusive expression so wonderfully portrayed on the canvas. Da Vinci dared not have her sit for him very often, for he feared that too frequent repetition might lessen the strange effect of her surroundings. Some one has said that this picture is divine work rather than the work of man. And it is true that in facial expression and in the delicacy of skin texture Da Vinci has here wrought to a degree almost perfect.

It is estimated that the original "Mona Liza" could be sold to-day for anywhere from $250,000 to $500,000. It is beyond doubt one of the masterpieces of art, and we know of no subject more deserving of a place in the home than the beautiful and sublime "Mona Liza." It is impossible to think of owning the original "Mona Liza," but The Christian Herald's reproduction from the original painting is absolutely flawless in every detail. Copies of reproductions, far below The Christian Herald's picture, command from $3.00 to $10.00 a copy. We offer you "Mona Liza" in return for a favor. Read our offer below.

"MONA LIZA"

Painted by Leonardo Da Vinci.
Actual Size, 11½ x 17¼ Inches.

NOTE—This reproduction is only a half-tone, which by no means conveys the full measure of beauty of the double-tone photogravure.

How to Get the Picture Almost FREE

FOR several years it has been customary for the readers of The Christian Herald, and the publishers, to enter into a co-operative plan, having for its object the introduction of the magazine into homes where its influence would be felt in a manifestly effective manner. This plan has always been productive of fine results to the readers, by giving them a substantial reward; to the new readers thus introduced, by providing them with the helpful comradeship of The Christian Herald, and to the publishers, by enabling them to send you each week a better and a more entertaining magazine.

Believing that you have the same deep and sincere interest in The Christian Herald that you have shown in the past, we ask for your co-operation in our endeavor to widen the constantly increasing circulation of The Christian Herald. Your task will be an easy and pleasant one, requiring no work to speak of, and at the same time offering an opportunity to secure a copy of an excellent reproduction of one of the world's greatest paintings. Your only expense will be 10 cents, the cost of mailing, etc.

The Christian Herald has, for years, achieved a glorious success in carrying forward religious and philanthropic causes. Much of its splendid record belongs to its readers—to you who have always been loyal and responsive. But the opportunity for still greater work is so big that we are anxious to go forward at an even faster pace than ever. Won't you therefore work with us, hand in hand, for a gradual but sure growth in the Christian Herald Family?

WHY AND HOW WE CAN MAKE YOU THIS EXTRAORDINARY OFFER

Can't you call to mind the names of many people who would enjoy, and possibly be benefited by, The Christian Herald? There are thousands of persons scattered far and wide who would appreciate the Herald, and they would gladly subscribe if they knew of the value and helpfulness of The Christian Herald. It would take years and years for us to reach even a tithe of these people, but you can aid us very materially.

We therefore ask you to send us the names of twenty-five people, consisting of heads of families and young men and women you think desirable. Only one name is required from a family. To these names we will send sample copies of The Christian Herald and of our Special Holiday Offers.

To reward you for your courtesy in assisting THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to increase its Family of loyal and enthusiastic readers, we will send you a copy of the famous "Mona Liza," asking you to pay the cost of packing, mailing, etc., which in every case will be but 10 cents. There is no further expense attached to this offer, and we guarantee to deliver the picture securely packed, uncreased and in perfect condition. Won't you give us the stimulating influence of your support in our effort to send The Christian Herald, with its message of love and cheer, into more homes throughout the land? You can easily supply the names; you will do it, and we are going to depend upon you.

PLEASE OBSERVE THESE CONDITIONS — THE DEMAND WILL BE HEAVY — ACT QUICKLY

We ask you to kindly send us the names of twenty-five people, who in your estimation would enjoy The Christian Herald. These people should be carefully selected. The names of Sunday School Superintendents, Teachers, Sunday School attendants and ardent church workers are the very best kind of people you can get. All good, thrifty people, people of an optimistic frame of mind, would be sure to be interested in The Christian Herald.

Send only one name from each family. Write plainly. Be sure to spell the names correctly, and if you have any doubt about the spelling of any name verify it by inquiring of your postmaster or by reference to a directory or telephone book. Write on one side of the paper only.

Every name must have a Prefix (such as Mr., Mrs., Miss, Dr., Prof., Rev.), Christian name (as Mary, John, etc.), Post-Office Address, County and State. In case of Free Delivery Office in city or country, either the Street Address or the number of the Rural Free Delivery route should be supplied. Thus an address correctly supplied would read something like this:

Dr. James Potter, Chicago, Cook Co., Ill., 572 Adams Street.
OR:—
Miss Ruth Jackson, Westminster, Worcester Co., Mass., R.F.D. No. 6.

Address your letter to "Name Department," Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City. Enclose ten cents in stamps or silver to pay packing and mailing expenses of the beautiful "Mona Liza," which will be sent you at once.

As the offer is confined to the members of The Christian Herald Family and their immediate friends, it is essential for you to sign your letter as follows:

"I am a Christian Herald reader."
OR:—
"I am a friend of a Christian Herald reader."

As we have heretofore observed, it is our intention to send copies of our Holiday Offers to these names. Therefore it is highly important to select them carefully, and to be absolutely sure that they are written plainly enough to be transmitted correctly. A little care here will save you disappointment.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

D. C., Springfield, Mo. 1. How many people are engaged in agricultural occupations in this country? 2. How many people are in the different professions? 3. How many in domestic service and kindred work?

1. According to the figures of 1900, those of the census of 1910 in regard to occupations not yet being obtainable, there were 10,438,219 in agricultural pursuits. 2. In the professions there were 1,264,737. 3. In domestic work of various kinds 5,691,746. Of course the latest figures when published will doubtless increase considerably the numbers in each division.

G. W., St. Johns, Mich. 1. Were the Scythians the ancestors of the present race of Chinese? If not, from what race or races did they come? 2. Is it likely that the Toltecs and Aztecs were descended from the ancient Egyptians?

1. Herodotus and Hippocrates say that Mongolians inhabited the region between the Carpathians and the Caucasus; and that these Scythians came from China; but modern authorities have decided that they did not come from China. Some writers hold that the Scythians were the ancient representatives of the modern Tartars. 2. No. The best authorities say that the Toltecs, a somewhat cultured race, who preceded the Aztecs by a long period, came from the northern barbarians, though some historians have ascribed their origin to the Egyptians, and others to the Phœnicians. The origin of both Toltecs and Aztecs is very obscure.

W. A. W., Castleton, Ont., Can. Give some light on the verse Matt. 21: 44.

Jesus was here speaking of the kingdom of God as a temple, in the erection of which a certain stone, at first rejected by the builders as unsuitable, is declared by the Lord of the temple to be the keystone of the whole. (See Isa. 8: 15; Dan. 2: 34, 35; Zech. 12: 3.) While the builders might stumble on the stone and be hurt, their hurt would be as nothing compared with what would happen if the stone should fall upon them. This stone is the Messiah, who has become a "rock of offense" that will crush whomsoever it falls upon, or, as the R. V. translates it, "will scatter them as dust." It was a parable intended specially for the Pharisees, who were actively opposing Christ and his ministry.

Ella M., Providence, R. I. To what extent is faith essential to the realization of a Christian life?

Christianity is faith in practice. No one can be a Christian without the supreme exercise of faith in God and in his Son. But until we step out of the environment of our human intellectuality and begin the experience of a life of faith, we cannot comprehend those things that appeal most strongly to the believer, and which to him are the most real of all. The enlightened soul can comprehend what to the unenlightened is veritable darkness, or as Paul said: "To the Greeks, foolishness."

Reader, Enola, Pa. 1. Will a true Christian have enemies?

1. He is quite liable to have enemies. The whole history of Christian experience demonstrates this. There are many who mock at religion and scorn its professors, and who will not hesitate to injure them. Those who follow Christ must be prepared to suffer and to make sacrifice. 2. Your second question (not printed here) relates to a provision of the ancient Jewish law which may have been expedient in that remote age but is not so now. The Gospel invitation makes no distinction. Christ says, "Whosoever will may come."

C. C. B., Morganton, N. C. 1. How does Commander Peary pronounce his name—Perry, Parry, or Peery? 2. Please give me your understanding of what the Apostle Paul meant when he said, in II. Cor. 12: 16, "Being crafty, I caught you with guile." 3. In Raphael's painting of "The Transfiguration," I wish an explanation of the presence of two persons on the mountain, besides Peter, James and John. They appear on the side of the hill, and viewing the transfiguration scene. 4. Is there any authority for the Saviour, Moses and Elias being lifted up from the ground as in the Ascension? See Luke 9: 29-31. 5. How is it that Luke, in chapter 19, records the Saviour as driving out the money-changers from the temple just after the triumphal entry only a few days before his death; and John relates it as occurring just after the water miracle in Cana of Galilee, in the beginning of his ministry?

1. The last of the three, we believe. 2. The passage is really a question to be read thus: "But you may say—granted that I did not burden you myself, but, being cunning, caught you with guile and made a gain of you by means of others, yet you will know that I made no such gain." The grammatical form of the translation is involved and slightly misleading. 3. It would seem to have been the artist's idea to have these figures as direct spectators—the only ones on the canvas. The figures, so far as known, have no special significance. 4. It was An Extraordinary Demand!

"MONA LISA" ORDERS COMING IN RAPIDLY

THAT Christian Herald readers appreciate art—real art, that has endured for ages—is being conclusively shown by our offer of a copy of Leonardo Da Vinci's masterpiece, "Mona Lisa." The responses are so spontaneous and quick that they far exceed our most sanguine expectations. Hundreds and hundreds of orders have been received, and many, many more are coming in almost as regularly as heart-beats.

You know we offer you a copy of "Mona Lisa," size 11½ x 17¼ inches, which is a very good reproduction of the original $250,000 painting, in return for your courtesy in sending us the names of twenty-five persons you think would appreciate The Christian Herald. As the offer does not expire until October 15, 1910, we repeat the offer and give you still another chance to secure this wonderful picture almost free.

"MONA LISA"

Painted by Leonardo Da Vinci. Actual Size, 11½ x 17¼ Inches

What we want you to do is to send us the names of twenty-five people, relatives, friends or acquaintances of yours, who in your judgment might be induced to subscribe for The Christian Herald. The names of Sunday School Superintendents, Teachers, Sunday School attendants, church-going people, thrifty citizens and others are the kind of names we prefer.

Only one name is required from a family. Be sure to spell the names correctly and send complete addresses, rural routes, counties, streets, etc. Use full names, such as Mr. or Mrs., Dr., Prof., Rev., etc. Send your list to us, together with ten cents to pay mailing and packing expenses, and a beautiful photogravure of "Mona Lisa" will be sent you by return mail.

As the Photogravures are going rapidly, we urge you to send your list quickly so as to avoid disappointment. We should like to see a copy of "Mona Lisa" in the home of every Christian Herald reader, and we hope you will take advantage of this rare opportunity to obtain a copy of this most wonderful of all paintings—an offer that will probably never be made to you again—almost without cost.

"Mona Lisa" is more than a mere painting; it is expressive of life, of sentiment, of repose, of love. It is a picture that grows on you—the more you see of it the more wonderful it becomes. You can never get enough of "Mona Lisa," and your home is sure to be greatly enriched by this beautiful photogravure of the highest-priced painting in the world. Don't delay! Get a copy of "Mona Lisa" by acting quickly. Send in your twenty-five names NOW. If not now, at least not later than October 15. Names postmarked "Oct. 15" will be accepted. no doubt the artistic interpretation of a supernatural state or condition, lifted above earth and glorified by the surroundings. According to the early commentators there were two distinct episodes of the kind, one at the outset and the other toward the close of our Lord's public life. There are, however, many good authorities who hold to the opinion that there was but one incident—that which is most accurately recorded by Luke.

H. S. K., Valley Falls, N. Y. Is "consumption," referred to in Lev. 26: 16, the same that we call tuberculosis or consumption now?

The original word, which in the A. V. and R. V. is given as "consumption," is capable of a different rendering. In the Septuagint the word literally means "scab" or "skin disease." This is the only passage in which this particular word occurs and it may be rendered "wasting away" or "wasting away"—possibly the equivalent of consumption, but by no means certainly so.

S. G., Seattle, Wash. Were any books of the New Testament written by Gentile Christians?

While most of the New Testament writers were Jewish, there were exceptions. Timothy, to whom Paul wrote so lovingly, was the son of a mixed marriage, the mother a Jewess, the father a Greek Gentile. (See Acts 16: 1.) Paul, bearing a Gentile name after his conversion, was first Saul, the Jew, a descendant of the tribe of Benjamin, and inherited Roman citizenship from his father. Luke was not born a Jew, for he was not reckoned among them by Paul. (See Col. 4: 11, 14.) Of his history before his conversion nothing is known, but it is inferred that he was a physician residing at Troas, converted by Paul and attaching himself to the apostle ardently thereafter. Several notable authorities hold that he was one of the first converted Gentiles. Mark was a Jew with a Roman name, Marcus, his Jewish name being John. (See Acts 12: 12, 25.) This is a parallel with the change of name from Saul to Paul after conversion.

R. U., St. Lambert, Que., Canada. Where is the original of the famous painting of the Last Supper, which is so often copied—the one where the disciples are sitting on one side of a long table?

The original is a fresco painting in the Church of the Ognisanti, Florence, Italy. It was painted by Domenico Ghirlandajo. It was painted about 1480.

P. M. B., Avalon, Pa. Explain where the temple of the moon was situated, and what tribe worshiped the moon.

The moon has been regarded as an object of worship in many lands, and we do not know which temple you refer. The ancient Syrians regarded it as the passive power in nature and the sun was the active; the people in Mesopotamia worshiped it as a male deity under the name of Lunus. Most countries, however, regarded it as a feminine deity. The Egyptians, according to Plutarch, called the moon the mother of the world, and worshiped it under the name of Isis. In North and South America the natives regarded it as a god. The North American Indians regarded it as the leader of the spirits of evil. Moon worship still persists in Africa.

Miscellaneous

The Los Angeles Express and the Pomona, Calif., Progress are the latest additions to the honor list of newspapers that do not publish liquor advertisements. The list is now attaining respectable proportions.

F. A. B., Plainville, Mass. There is nothing further recorded beyond the statements of Josephus. The new Jewish Encyclopædia (Funk & Wagnalls) may give you the historical data you want. See it in any good public library.

C. C., Green Lake, Wash. 1. The population of Palestine is not accurately known, but that of Jerusalem is estimated at 48,000. 2. It is under Turkish control, but its population includes Mohammedans, Syrians, Armenians, Greeks, Jews, Catholics, etc.

Mrs. S., Highland, Conn. You have misunderstood the answer. We can set no limit to God's mercy. On Scriptural grounds, however, we must distinguish between involuntary or unintentional sin and deliberate sin. For a converted person to yield to deliberate sin argues a very serious state, but not necessarily unpardonable.

J. O., Ipswich, S. D. The Scriptural account of the Ascension simply says he was received out of their sight. Human vision could not penetrate further. We are told distinctly that flesh and blood (being mortal) cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven, which is purely spiritual.

G. S. N., Westboro, Mass. Our answer distinguished between proselytism and conversion. The latter, being a work of the Spirit, is an essential part of the change in man's nature from sin to holiness. Mere profession of Christianity won't do; there must be the regenerative work of the Spirit. Hence, as we believed we had made clear, a "resolve" is not equivalent to conversion by any means. No effort of the human will can perform the office of redeeming grace.

MY LITTLE TOUR IN ICELAND

By MRS. W. F. CRAFTS

ICELAND! the name itself is a barrier to tourist travel. But let the tourist ignore prejudice and embark at Copenhagen or Leith, and he will find a delightful voyage over a smiling summer sea if he should go during June, July or August. He will be hardly more than two days out of sight of land — the far-reaching rock-bound coast of Scotland or the snow-crowned peaks of Iceland — but the journey across will occupy about four days. For his amusement the dolphins will tumble, the whales will spout, the seal will swim, and the seabirds will fly; and there will be glorious sunrises and sunsets, with hardly more than two hours of night intervening. When he finally reaches Iceland, he will see the sun set at 11.40 o'clock, and rise again shortly after twelve o'clock, the golden glow of the sunset mingling with the golden glow of the sunrise.

Mrs. Ingeveldar Gudmundsdotter
A Famous Daughter of Iceland

All these delights can not be assured to the winter traveler to Iceland. In fact, he will be obliged to keep his lamp burning until half past ten in the morning, and then to light it again at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The tourist will probably be surprised to find how warm it is in Iceland in the summer, the days averaging from 54 to 70 degrees. It is said that the winters are not as cold as in Canada, owing to the Gulf Stream. In the Smithsonian Report it is stated that Iceland has a higher temperature than some lands located thirty degrees farther south. But let the tourist not be misled into carrying summer clothing, particularly if he is to tour the island, riding over lava fields and among the mountains, visiting geysers and glaciers. There are one hundred and thirty glaciers in Iceland. Hardly any tourist will care to visit them all!

One must go everywhere on ponies, excepting to Thingvellir, the ancient seat of government; to that tourists may go in pony carts if they choose, but they generally choose to ride on the backs of the ponies—and three ponies must be allowed for each person to provide a relay. The ponies are small, averaging twelve hands in height, but they are sturdy and sensible; for when they want water they stand still, and almost ask for it. They do the same when they want grass, or when something is wrong about the harness. The clatter of their little hoofs is almost a constant sound in Iceland. In color they are usually a light sorrel or white, with very heavy manes and tails. They safely carry their riders across streams when the water reaches to their haunches, and they will also carry them far up the steep sides of Hecla, the King Mountain. Wherever he goes, the tourist need have no fear of being held up, or of foul play, as robberies are unknown and only one murder has been committed, and that was twenty years ago. So safe is touring in Iceland that some English ladies have walked between three and four hundred miles, unattended.

The tourist need not look for shelter under trees, for there are none; nothing but juniper brush, and very little of that; but for greenness there were moss-covered lava beds with patches of very short grass, and flowers such as we are accustomed to see in our own land—dandelions, buttercups, geraniums, vetch, clover and daisies. The prettiest of all were the small pink flowers of the moss. Mountains with snow patches are never out of sight, and the way would seem lonely if there was not an occasional meeting of a pony caravan carrying either tourists or bags of wool, dried fish or other provisions.

There is no danger of losing the way, for it is marked by piles of stones six or seven feet high at rather short intervals. Occasionally one will come across a shelter-house about twenty-four feet long and half as wide, built of stone, with a cross fastened on the roof. Any one overtaken by a storm is welcome to occupy it. It is empty, but is so constructed that both men and ponies can be accommodated. Many tourists come to Iceland to fish, and they pay a large price for the privilege—as much as two thousand dollars for the exclusive right to one river during the fishing season. They secure as prizes huge salmon. In the smaller rivers and in the lakes there is a great abundance of trout; and in the sea, cod and other varieties.

The tourist is almost sure to enter Iceland at Reykjavik—a city of twelve thousand inhabitants, by far the largest in Iceland. As yet there is no wharf, so that passengers must leave the ship by a small row boat, and land on the stones. The dwelling houses and shops of Reykjavik are built mostly of corrugated iron, but in the near future they are proposing to build with tufa-stone and cover it with plaster, which will make a very comely city. Reykjavik has a public library and museum, several good school buildings and churches, a normal school, a college and three hospitals. One of these is a leper hospital, situated a little way out of the city on the border of the sea.

It has at this time less than one hundred lepers—all there are in Iceland. I made a visit there to talk with four leper Esperantists. They were very expert in their use of the language, and they told me that its acquirement had afforded them a pleasurable pastime. I think they are the only leper Esperantists in the world.

In the neighborhood of Reykjavik is a natural laundry. Water comes out of the ground at the boiling point. Eggs dropped in will be thoroughly cooked in three minutes. But it is the resort of washerwomen. They bring their soiled clothes from the city in carts, wash the dirt out of them in sheds, and then throw them into the boiling spring to be scalded, and into the cold spring just at hand to be rinsed, and then they are hung out on lines, or laid on the grass to dry.

Characteristic Views of the Mountains, Fjords and Seacoast of Iceland

The people of Iceland greatly interested me. They are descended from a race of bold warriors and bolder sailors. Ingolf was the first Icelander. He left Norway in 874 A.D., and fifty thousand other Norwegians followed him in sixty years to escape the unjust rule of King Harold Fairhair. These people set up a national court, called the Logretta. It was a congress and a supreme court in one, and Ingolf was elected the Logsogumadr, or speaker, with a three years' tenure of office. The parliament consisted of forty-eight members, who each had two counselors. They assembled in Thingvellir (the meeting place), a valley four miles wide, through which flows the river Oxara (ax water), descending in glorious falls called foss. On one side of the valley is a perpendicular wall of rock, one hundred feet high, looking altogether like a

Rev. A. H. C. Morse, D.D.*

POWERFUL PROMISES

TEXT—II. Peter 1:4

AT any rate, the Bible is frank. It says the plainest things about man's sin. But it also holds before him a wonderful hope. To-day he is mired in corruption. To-morrow he may have escape from this and become like God. The whole Gospel is found in these few words.

We have here a statement of the fact of sin, and its origin. The fact is "corruption"; and the origin is "through lust." I know that there are worldly-wise men who sneer at the third chapter of Genesis. But this I have noticed: that they are uniformly unable to give us a simpler solution of the origin and mystery of evil. Somewhere, and at some time, the race must have sinned. The stream of life has been poisoned; and this must have taken place at its fountain head, for we cannot find any divisions of that stream which have not the entire characteristics of the whole. The Bible says the event took place in the first man, before a single son was born; that he lusted after something which was forbidden to him, and that by his disobedience he fell from his primal innocence, degraded the race, and entailed a condition of corruption; that we also have aggravated this calamity by repeating sin, and deepening the ruin.

The Region of Self-Denial

I am not so much concerned about the origin of this condition. We can leave that with a single word. But there are certain facts which cannot be brushed aside. A man may question the story as it is written in Scripture; but he cannot deny it, for it does not come within the region of denial. Neither can he deny the story as it is reproduced in actual life to-day. Have you never plucked forbidden fruit? Have you never lusted for pleasures which have been distinctly forbidden? And as a consequence of transgression, have you never experienced a repulsive sickness, and an intolerable loathing, so that you also have known the meaning of this phrase, "the corruption which is in the world through lust"? Do you not know anything of the lashings of remorse?

Let me ask you another question: How does it happen that the heart is so constantly "running down"? Why must it be repeatedly wound up, and fastened with ratchets? Why do we have to make, and repeat, and renew resolves, and lash the will to "the sticking place"? Why is it that a man never backslides into holiness? Why cannot we take off the brakes, and find ourselves just gliding into the highest moral living? Everything, we are told, tends to move in the line of least resistance. Do we find that we are drifting toward charity and holiness and benevolence and virtue? Nay, but to all of us, these graces are the fruit of serious toil. They are magnificent possessions, more precious than gold and sparkling gems; but they are gotten by struggle and privation and self-denial. And that word "self-denial" contains a fossil history of primal sin. It tells us of an evil self, that must be constantly denied, because its desires are wrong. But whence this evil self, and whence these wrong desires?

Secret Thoughts and Hidden Sins

But let us come a little closer to this subject. Let me hint at the things that we cannot spread before the public—our secret thoughts and the faults which are hidden. The thoughts that creep into the heart and nestle there. Can you tell me whence they come? Tell me, for instance, whence come envy, and jealousy, and malice, and evil desire; and the lust for gold that makes the thief, and the thirst for blood which crimsons the hand of murder? Do you not think that these things arise in human life, as malaria and pestilence from a death-dealing bog? Do they not bespeak what this Scripture calls a "corruption which is in the world through lust"? I suppose that the angels, before the throne of God, would not shrink from having their thoughts proclaimed with the trumpet of Gabriel. I know that Jesus has opened his heart, and challenged the world. "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" said he. But we cannot do that. We hide our thoughts, and cover our faults with a crimson blush, and walk among our nearest friends with a coward's step. What, then, has befallen man? If God made him innocent—and no one questions this—then something must have happened to corrupt his thoughts, and make them so black that he stands in dread of that day for which all other days were made, when his hidden history shall be revealed.

There is something pathetic in man's attempts to assert his worth. He speaks, for instance, of the "majesty of conscience," and the "dignity of human nature," and of the "fatherhood of God," and the "brotherhood of man" as if these terms were true and meaningful to-day. Take the first of these and see what comfort there is in it. "The majesty of conscience!" Do you not know that conscience almost always speaks in judgment? It seems to have lost its authority to command, if it ever possessed that authority. It cannot insist upon obedience, but can only raise its voice in remonstrance. It can be easily overruled and voted down; and then it can only record a minority vote, and lapse into silence.

What a Child of God Really Is

I wish I could stop to speak of these other shibboleths. They are talked in political canvass, and cheered in meetings of anarchists. I have heard them used in Christian pulpits. "The dignity of man!" That phrase only becomes glorious in the light of a far-off day. "The fatherhood of God," and the "brotherhood of man"! These do not represent an actual possession, but they tell of a wonderful possibility. We must not mistake. As used in many instances they seem like a determination on the part of man to brave it out with God. I wish I could go into the street, and tell every man that he is by nature a child of God. I wish I could preach the natural sonship of man. But before I start I hear the Master's solemn word, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." There is a great truth to publish to men. It tells of the Fatherhood of God; but this is found only in Jesus Christ. If any man be in him, he is a new creature. He has "escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust," and has become a partaker of the divine nature. There, and there only, is the ground for the Fatherhood of God. And when I hear a man flinging over all men this mantle of sonship, I pity him, and can only excuse him because he has become confused by the lingering remembrance of primal innocency. Be not deceived. Man was made upright, but something must have happened; and that something is the sin which is in the world. We may have a race-memory of Eden. We may stand with shaded eyes, and dimly discern the coming glory.

The Terrible Fact of Sin

But neither of these things must blind us to the present humiliating conditions. Sonship is only in Christ. "To as many as received him, to them gave he the power to become the sons of God." Never should we have known how unfilial we are, unless we had looked on Jesus, and had beheld his spotless obedience to the Father's will. It is best for us to face the fact. We hear men, with little love for holiness, talking of God as Father, and we do not contradict them, for we are glad to have them talk of him at all. But look about: Men who never pray from year to year, nor offer a single word of thanks for health and plenty; men who are lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God; men whose God is their belly; earthly, sensual, devilish; men whose daily business is the ruining of the souls and bodies of others; betrayers of virtue, defilers of the flesh, lawless, disobedient, unholy, profane. Must I fling over all these the mantle of the Fatherhood of God? Or shall I believe the word of Jesus when he said, "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye do."

But there is more in this Scripture than a statement of the fact of sin. Here are also "these great and precious promises, whereby we may become partakers of the divine nature." That is, men may become as God. And the warrant for this promise is found in the fact of a correspondence between the divine and the human. The natural man cannot discern spiritual things; and it is no use to talk to him about them, for there is no correspondence, no basis of affinity, no ground of fellowship. But man was made in the image of God, and it was possible for God to take upon himself man's nature. And it is within the power of every man, and this by t grace of God, to take on also the divine nature, a to be made like God.

This is what is said in the word before us. A it is done by a single act. Man fell, we are told, reaching after a divine attribute of knowledge. " shall be as God," was the lying promise of t tempter, and by listening to that we lost our fi estate. But now God returns to us with the promi that after all we shall be as himself, sharers in h nature, and conformed to his image. It seer strange to you, that, for a single sin, so serious co sequence should be entailed? That could only because the stream was poisoned at its source, a the race sinned in its first man. But here is som thing quite as great. The Lord is making to hi self a new creation. He has begun it in one N Man, who kept his life without spot or blemis And in his life and federal headship we share by single act of faith. The consequences of faith a quite as great as the consequences of disobedien "He that believeth on him hath everlasting life And that does not mean simply that his life is p longed in endless time, but that it is endowed wi a new and immortal beauty, capacity and joy.

The New Birth

This is received the instant one believes, and, by a new birth, he has passed from death to li He hath been already delivered from the bonda and corruption of the kingdom of darkness, and h been colonized in the kingdom of God's Son. He born of God, a son of the Most High, a citizen heaven. A single sin has stained the race. We la hold on death; and, spite of tears and cries a struggle, we have not been able to loose the ho One single act of faith takes hold on eternal lif and, spite of sins and falls and failures, that pri can never be wrested from our grasp. And this all by faith.

Men have said to me that the scheme of salvati is arbitrary. It is vain, they say, to shut the wor up to faith. But, my friend, do you not know th the entire universe is arbitrary? There is nothi more arbitrary than the laws of mathematics, or health, or of gravitation. Is it not strange th every son of Adam is shut up to the multiplicati table? Is it not strange that if a man wants compute numbers in China, he must use the ide tical system of numbers that we use here? Th three and two make five there as they do here? N there is but one law for light, or heat, or electrici or numbers, or gravitation, in all the earth. A this is not narrow, because it is entirely adequa So there is but one way of salvation in all the eart nor is this narrow, because it also is entirely ac quate. Here it is said "through these promise which only means that it is by faith in Christ. promise is nothing except for the value of the pe son who makes it. Some men make promises, a no man gives them heed. But if one promises who character you know, then you count on that as up the rising of the sun.

The Heart's Deceitfulness

We hear a great deal in these days about educ tion into the kingdom of God; about the natur development of righteousness. But development only unfolding, and that the race has been doing all the centuries, and each age surpasses the last abandon to sin. Education is drawing out. B how can you draw holiness from a heart that "deceitful above all things and desperately wicked Education can never do the work. It is like puttin a new handle upon the pump, and leaving the d in the well.

You may wonder at the fancy of bringing in new and supernatural life by belief in precio promises. But all questions are answered by t experiences of history. Great men have been generated by single words of Scripture. This w true of Augustine and Luther and Spurgeon, a scores of others whom time fails me to name. Th were not only new men, but mighty sons of G Wonderful was this? As great as the wonder in forms of life. Look into the acorn, and tear halves apart, and tell me if you can see therein t stalwart oak. Analyze the grain of wheat and t me if you can see therein the waving fields. W said Jesus, "The words which I speak to you, th

Holiday Rain Insurance

NSURANCE has been made to cover almost every happening in England, h as the death of the sovereign, matic conditions affecting the suc- s of a pageant, a horse show, an ricultural fair, etc., and now a new m of insurance has been inaug- ated which will enable persons whose lidays have been marred by rain to ain, under certain conditions, mone- y compensation.

Underwriters are prepared to insure ainst one-tenth of an inch of rain lling on more than two days a week any towns on the south and east asts of England between Bourne- uth and Scarborough, where the ly rainfall is either officially pub- hed or where satisfactory records n be obtained.

If the insured desires to double the mount in the way of premium he eives double the amount as compen- ion. If higher compensation is ired, a proportionately higher pre- um will be charged. The under- iters will accept a certificate of the itish Rainfall Organization as evi- nce of rainfall. The policies will vide that the greater portion of the e-tenth of an inch of rain, the quan- y which by the terms of the policy l constitute a wet day of twenty- ur hours, must fall during the day- he.—*Consul-General John L. COLUMBUS DAY

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

WEDNESDAY, October 12, is Columbus Day. In New York State it is a legal holiday. The 418th anniversary of the discovery of America. The Italians love a holiday, and more than 20,000 of these holiday-lovers will parade.

As Columbus was an Italian they have the first right to this day. America is a great country. The Indians should have a holiday, as they were here first. You boys and girls should fall in line and join with the Indians in their celebration. An Italian discovered America; fall in line and help them to celebrate. The Jews made it money-possible for the Italian to find America. Into line, all of you, when the Jew celebrates. It was the Spanish flag that first floated in America. Spain therefore has some first rights, and you must fall in line when the Spaniards celebrate. The Dutch discovered how to get the country from the Indians without fighting for it, and almost without paying for it. Put on the wooden shoes and march with the Dutch when they celebrate. An Englishman commanded the ship that brought the Dutch. Get a Union Jack and parade with the English when they celebrate. A Frenchman, Lafayette, helped us to gain our Independence. The French therefore should have a day and we should march with them.

NOW glance back and see what a wonderful parade this will make, and how many flags will be floating, and how many languages will be spoken. We call ourselves Americans. But who are we? If you throw a stone at an American you are liable to hit a Dutchman, an Englishman, a German, a Frenchman, a Welshman, and almost all the other nations of the world. Why? Because many of the Americans have the blood of nearly all the nations flowing in their veins. The Italian is here learning English.

Do you Juniors pray for the Italians? They are making our roads and streets, digging our tunnels and subways, and doing most of our hard work. When you feel unkindly to the Italian and want to say unkind words at him, just imagine Columbus sitting on a cloud and looking down at you. Would you be surprised if he should speak right out and say, "I discovered America, and my people have a right here to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

THE Italian came from the country that looks like a boot. He has walked into America with his boots on, and God is giving him something to do for America. In the fifteenth century England gave us William Tyndall, who translated the Bible into the English language. Germany gave us John Guttenberg, who gave us movable type with which to print the Bible. While we are thankful for these and other men who helped to make America great, we must not forget the Italians. Italy has given us some great and good men. Columbus was one, Michael Angelo was another. And we must not forget Savonarola.

When Columbus was being guided by God in the discovery of America, Savonarola was doing more than all others to found the Republic of Florence, Italy. When you see men building a house or store, you will notice a man holding a piece of blue paper with lines and marks on it. This is called a blue print, the plan of the building that is to be put up. This little Republic in Italy, that Savonarola did so much to establish, was God's blue print, one of the plans for the great American Republic.

I want you boys and girls to go to the library this week and get the Life of Savonarola, and read it carefully. I am going to ask Paul Suter to tell you a story:

IF the doctor's sons had not been mowing the grass they might never have noticed him; for he was a little fellow, and he had been trying hard to escape their notice when the lawn mower ran him down. Now he lay quite still, and Harry and Ralph looked down at him sorrowfully. He was only a toad; but, as Ralph said, he might have a wife and family waiting for him at home, and, anyway, maybe toads were some good in the world. The doctor was looking out of his study window, and he overheard them.

"Bring him in, boys," he called to them. "Maybe we shall be able to restore Mr. Toad to his family."

"Now, while I am trying to bring him back to life," he said, "I should like you to tell me what you know about a toad."

"He gives people warts when they touch him," declared Harry.

THE doctor laughed and looked at his own hand. "I have touched him more than once in the last few minutes. What else?"

"I'm afraid that's all we know," Ralph said, after a pause.

Sure enough, they returned in a few minutes to find the little fellow looking very spry indeed.

"Oh, I'm so glad!" Harry exclaimed. "We wouldn't want him to die for anything. Why, we've found that toads are useful! The natural history says they kill more than their weight of caterpillars and bugs in a single day. We need him in the garden."

They escorted Mr. Toad out again; but, just as they reached the last step, he gave a flying leap and landed in a flower bed. Then he started away at a lively pace, as if to make up for the lost time.

"Good-by, Mr. Toad," Harry called after him. "Remember us to your family!"

If we knew the Italian better we would find he is not as bad as we supposed. We would find him a very useful man.

They of Italy salute you.

The Fighting Boy

By Lucy Rider Meyer

"A BOY will fight," said the Settlement deaconess; "It is apparently an essential necessity of boy nature. But he will fight just as readily for the right as for the wrong if he's only started that way. Let me tell you a story:

"I live right in the midst of boys. The streets around the Settlement fairly swarm with them. Once, in the early days of our work, these boys mischievously got wind of a meeting in our club rooms, and they besieged the door in a boisterous mob. It was all we could do to keep them from breaking up the meeting. Our janitor was not as gentle as he was forceful in his management of the situation, and in shutting out one obstreperous youngster, whose wizened little face looked almost as devoid of any moral sense as a monkey's, he caught the boy's foot in the door. The boy screamed in pain. I was conscience-stricken.

" 'Oh, g'wan!' said a policeman, who had been attracted to the spot. 'He ain't hurt none!' But I insisted. I brought the sobbing child inside and took off his ragged shoe, to find out how badly he was hurt. I did not need to take off the stocking, for it ended abruptly at the heel—that a stocking should have a foot, which is, of course, all covered up by the shoe, is an unnecessary luxury, anyway. The foot was not much hurt, but I bathed it and bound my handkerchief carefully around it—it was an old handkerchief. The little fellow stopped crying and watched me with the greatest interest.

"The night of the next meeting, the unruly crowd gathered again at the door, and again we were bordering on serious trouble, when, with a whoop of defiance, there bore down on the scene our lad of the hurt foot experience with a valiant companion whom he had enlisted for his holy war. They were each armed with a big banana stem, which they had picked out of some refuse heap—really formidable weapons in vigorous hands. The lad had not seemed very large the first night, but now his strength was as the strength of ten. We had no further need of policemen.

"The little fellow with his wizened face became one of my warmest friends and most loyal supporters. So quickly does the child heart respond to a little bit of love!"

Most Welcome of Them All

I RECEIVED the Red Letter Bible promptly and am writing, not only to acknowledge receipt, but to thank you for the liberality and generosity shown in the character and fulness of the premiums and paper. As a weekly visitor there is none more welcome among about twenty-five publications of various kinds, and your painstaking vigilance in doing your part to preserve our membership in the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family merits and will conduce to reciprocative effort on our part to continue the relationship.

New York's Pure Food Exhibition

By KATE UPSON CLARK

FOR a full week this month the great Madison Square Garden in New York has been devoted to the exploitation of Pure Food and many related subjects. The managers say that nothing is shown in this exposition except absolutely sterling products; and that, for the first time in America, no sum could be paid which would insure the entrance of an exhibitor whose manufactures did not come up to the highest test applied to everything there.

The great hall was elaborately decorated in pink and white, and artistic electric lights were everywhere. The holders of the booths vied with each other in efforts to produce beautiful effects. They proved that even so prosaic and practical an affair as a food show could be made delightful.

Famous candy and flavoring-extract makers; noted dairies; the principal canners of fruits and vegetables; the chocolate and cocoa makers; the cereal and flour makers; fruit dealers; oyster gatherers; mineral and distilled water manufacturers; coffee and tea dealers; native oil makers and olive oil importers; bread and yeast makers; and, to the regret of many, even the brewers; were fully represented.

But, interesting as were the food products, perhaps the display of ingenious modern devices for lightening the housewife's labor were even more attractive. Here were all kinds of gas and electrical appliances for heating, cooking, ironing and lighting. When the cost of these implements can be reduced to meet the circumstances of the average citizen; and when gas and electricity are for sale in every community, the drudgery of the housewife should be greatly diminished. The cleanliness of electricity is not the least of its recommendations.

Patented heating plates, porcelain-menders, vacuum-cleaners and many other new helps in housework were energetically operated on every side for the benefit of the crowds of spectators.

A famous New York department store showed model dining-rooms and a kitchen, elaborately furnished, and supplemented by a beautiful library, drawing-room and bedroom. Close by was a booth containing a pattern library for children, certified to contain only the best juvenile literature, and presided over by intelligent custodians, ready to furnish information to inquiring mothers and teachers.

Perhaps the sections which attracted the largest crowds were those devoted to the exposure of cheats in weights and measures; they were under the charge of New York State and New York City officials. The ingenuity of some of the devices for increasing the weight of goods was truly marvelous. A rubber band twisted about the goods-holder and fastened to the stem of the scale, naturally brought up the weight with marvelous quickness. One scale was shown placed on an empty box. Within the box was a weight attached by a wire to the goods-holder. Several ounces were shaved from a pound by this means. A bushel of potatoes, actually sold for such at one of our great markets, should have weighed sixty pounds, but turned the scale at forty-seven. False bottoms in measuring-boxes; bottles which should have held a quart, but which fell short; and numerous other shocking impositions upon a credulous public were shown.

A lecturer upon this subject before the exposition blamed the women for most of this cheating. He said that women did not hold the tradesmen to the right standard. They order by telephon too much, and give unbounded opportunities for er-reaching.

The Westfield (Mass.) Normal School sent wn a State chemist, with three Normal girl-pupi to demonstrate chemical facts which every h se-mother should know. The Pure Food Depart ent of the State of Ohio also sent a delegation to ow how they treat there offenders against the ure Food Laws. The United S tes Navy sent a good-looking ok, with all his ship-furnitu to show how our jack-tars nd middies are fed. A cour us paymaster, with uniforme as-sistants, displayed menus ct-ually prepared for our s ors and assured us that the A er-ican Navy is the best fed a ng all the navies of the world. An army exhibit of the same ort was just across the hall, nd was surrounded constantl by interested spectators.

The Little Mother Socie of New York, with five a ve branches in and near the ty, gave exhibitions of its mo of teaching cooking and se g. Classes of little girls we on hand at its booth every a er-noon and evening, to shov he excellent work of this ble institution.

The Equality League of lf-Supporting Women and he Collegiate Suffrage Associ on had booths in which reass g specimens were given of he skill in cooking and sewin of good suffragists. Charm g ladies presided over them nd did their best to impress on the gazing throng of attendants the righteousne of their cause. This was a most interesting corne of the exhibition.

Lectures on every phase of domestic science, om the most distinguished representatives of its ri-ous branches, were given in an adjoining hall ery afternoon and evening. The delights of the sh w drew an enormous crowd daily. Dainty specim s of the different edibles were freely dispensed t all comers. It was said that a really adequate di er could be obtained by sampling the contents of e attractive booths.

It was a wonderful show, and every city woul lo well to provide a similar one at least as ofte s once a year.

GIANT BALLOONS IN AERIAL CONTEST

DURING the last few weeks there has been an almost world-wide activity in aeronautics. Most conspicuous among many events was the proposed aeroplane race from Brigue, Switzerland, to Milan, for which several daring fliers were entered, including George Chavez, a Peruvian, Cattoneo, an Italian, and an American named Weyman. Chavez succeeded in flying across the Alps, near the Simplon Pass, making the greatest aerial flight yet recorded. He was injured on landing. Maneuvres in Picardy by two French army corps, during the first half of September, were valuable as showing that aeroplanes could be made of actual service for observation in war time.

The chief event on American soil was the championship balloon race at Indianapolis, which began September 17. There were entered in this contest the balloon America II., the Miss Sophia, the Luzerne, the Pennsylvania, the Million Club, the Centennial, the Hoosier, the Buckeye ,the New York and the Indiana. The big gas bags sailed away in excellent style, the race being to make a record for endurance. Up to Tuesday morning, September 20, all but three of the contestants—the Buckeye, New York and Miss Sophia—had alighted. There was some apprehension for the fate of the others, as the weather became stormy and it was feared they might have been carried out over the great lakes. These fears, fortunately, proved unfounded.

The balloon New York, Captain Baldwin, pilot, landed at Portsmouth, O. The balloon had a rough voyage, encountering hot sun, cold winds, rain, thunder and lightning in quick succession. The pilot and his aid used up nearly all the ballast and finally, having hardly a pound left, chose a safe-looking hillside for a landing. Another of the n s-ing balloons, the Buckeye, landed in Floyd Cou y, Va., at the village of Showalter. The balloon Sophia also made a safe descent near Medvale, a. The Indiana II., with Carl Fischer and Georg L. Bumbaugh aboard, passed all the other contest s but the America II. on Satu y night during a heavy storm. e drag-rope caught in a tree and d the balloon captive for sev l hours. Finally, some farmh s came to the rescue, climbed the e and cut the fliers loose. T y drifted along for a considerable s-tance, carrying tree branches w h them.

The Pennsylvania also had a thrilling experience. On Sun y night, it was hit by a storm d floundered for hours in dark s and amid high winds and blind g rain. At one time the ball n reached the amazing height f 24,000 feet. It descended quic y and the downward pace became -rific as it neared the earth, wh h it struck hard, rebounding ab t 100 feet and stunning the occupa s of the car.

Allen P. Hawley, of the Amer a II., had a disagreeable experie e. While he was flying over Nor e County, O., farmers shot at the g gas bag. Hawley and Augus s Post, his traveling companion, co d hear the whistling of the bullets

Which of the contestants in t s eventful aerial race is entitled o the endurance award has not t been definitely decided.

THE GREAT BICENTENARY DESCRIBED BY A PARTICIPANT

The Village Street, Grand Pre

"Evangeline's Well"

The Pathway Leading to Evangeline's Home

By Rev. WM. WILKINSON

HERE has just ended one of the most important historical series of services and meetings the Dominion of Canada has ever witnessed. o hundred years have passed since the first rayer Book" services were held, and to commorate that event came many distinguished lates, including two archbishops and many of bishops from all parts of Canada. There also ne the Lord Bishops of London, England, Inam of Glasgow, Campbell, the chaplain-general of ng George's forces, Bishop Taylor Smith, Chairn of the American House of Bishops, Lawrence, Boston, the Bishop of Washington, D. C., and Bishop of Duluth. There were also many rgymen of distinction from Britain, as Prebenry Storrs of St. Peter's parish, Eton Square, ndon; Venerable Archdeacon Maddon, Liverpool; . Van Allen, Boston; Dr. lliam Wilkinson, New York, d Rev. Mr. McComas, Anpolis, Md.

One of the truly significant ngs in the proceedings was royal way in which the men d women of other faiths gave lcome to the visitors and to Congress. President Fort, of Halifax, speaking at of the largest meetings on half of the Canadian Club, d, "I am a Presbyterian o, with men of like faith and n of other forms of religion n yours, come to greet and say to the Congress how d, how thankful we are for your good and noble work, d for the work men of your th are doing through the rld. There is no jealousy ween us. All good work st do good." The great audice sent up one mighty cheer, ich made the windows of the ll shake. When the Bishop London said, "Nine happy rs—years amongst the brightest of my life—I eached each week in Victoria Park, London. ere were in that park talking men who assailed revealed religion. I tell this bicentenary I had warmer, firmer, or more enthusiastic supporters n Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Congretionalists. All felt the faith was the important ng," there rose a cheer as the sound of many ters.

The one thing I noticed above every other, from st to last, was the warm, calm, deep earnestness all the sermons and addresses. Not a fad was roduced, controversy was held in check, and high igious, spiritual things re kept clearly in mind d in sight, while a sense duty was insisted upon. the last twenty years, Church has learned ch on these lines, and s thus added vastly to power to influence the eat world of action in Church of God.

The record of the celeation would be far from mplete, if it did not me the good women in nada, who follow Christ d in his Church min- er to him of their subnce. The bishop's wife, Mrs. Worrell, Mrs. Vernon, Mrs. Cunningham, Mrs. LeMoine, Mrs. Crawford, and a host of others made life pleasant in all useful ways.

The great cathedral in which the Congress met is Gothic. It stands on one of the high parts of Halifax. The length of the building is 255 feet, breadth 86 feet, and height 68 feet. It is proposed to add to the cathedral equipment many rooms for its needs as the years pass and as the money is given. As it now stands, it is a credit to the maritime provinces of Canada. The opening service of the cathedral was on Saturday morning, September 3. The people crowded every available spot in the sacred edifice. A long array of bishops and clergy in their vestments were in the spacious chancel; the music was good; the sermon by Bishop Courtney of New York was in all respects appropriate, and as he had been Bishop of the Diocese of Nova Scotia for fifteen years, he was at home and knew what the day stood for.

The Bishop of London Speaking on the Grounds of King's College, Windsor

On Sunday, September 4, the preacher at morning prayer was the Lord Bishop of London. At three o'clock Bishop Brent of the Philippine Islands preached a sermon to children. At 4.30 there was a mass meeting for men, Bishop Courtney in the chair, and Bishop John Taylor Smith speaker. At seven o'clock, Bishop Lawrence preached. The congregations were all very large and the services useful in their helpfulness. Two archbishops and eight bishops that day preached in parish churches.

In the Church Congress proper, the following subjects were considered: "The Church and the Commonwealth," "The Social Evil," "The Liquor Traffic," "The Attitude of the Church Toward Socialism," "The Child and the State," "The Child, the Church, and the Home," "The Sunday School," "The Workingman and His Problems," "Sunday School Methods," "The Practical Problems of the Canadian Church," etc. This list shows how deeply interested is the Church in the life that now is.

The remarkable thing about the bicentenary at Halifax is that the one mastering, intense desire shown was that of service. Whenever any man described it graphically, he was applauded to the echo. The sermons and the speeches showed what an evolution is taking place. Here are a few of the notable thoughts presented: "The unveiling of the face of Christ to man," the Bishop of Glasgow; "The need of personal religion and of kindness," the Chaplain-General; "The sight of Jesus and the needs of the world," Rev. Dr. Cody; "The Spirit of God, as the Source, Lord and Giver of life," the Bishop of Washington; "Common sense in religious work," Prebendary Storrs.

Another thing noticeable was the alertness of the tradesman in his knowledge of the influence of the Church in public life. The Canadian Club asked the Bishop of London to lecture; he did so. The subject was "The Secret of Success." The great hall was crowded. There was not in the lecture any of the tricks known so well to the orator. It was a heart-to-heart talk; plain, frank, honest; clear as a sunlit morning; and it drove home with mighty force. The need of humility, truth, perfect honesty and sincerity, and a desire to be useful. The Bishop said, "Let any man catch you once dishonest—some man will catch you, if you are—and your influence is lost. This is one of the saddest things for the man I know, and for the good of the world one of the most hopeful."

Bishop Worrell, Dean Crawford, Archdeacon Armitage, Rural Dean LeMoine, Rev. Mr. Vernon and all who have made the cathedral what it is, deserve the gratitude of the Province of Nova Scotia. King's College, Windsor, was visited and degrees were given to eminent men in attendance. On the way to Annapolis Royal to celebrate the 200th anniversary of the founding of the Church there, a halt was made at Grand Pré, where the school children formed a guard of honor for the bishops and visitors. An address was read, telling the deeds of fame done there, of the Acadians, the

A Talk with Our Family Circle

AT this season of the year, with the inflowing tide of new subscribers we are receiving daily many letters of congratulation and encouragement. It has always been the policy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to avail itself, on proper occasions, of the intimate relationship that should exist between a great journal and its readers, and these kindly communications we have mentioned seem to point to the present as a suitable time for a quiet, familiar talk with the members of our Family Circle. We trust they may find it both interesting and helpful, as they are all identified with the progress of the paper.

Immediately after the death of Dr. Klopsch, a wave of world-wide sympathy flowed in upon us from every quarter, bearing very grateful assurances of cordial support. We doubt if any journal, religious or secular, ever received such a demonstration of the warm friendship and cordial understanding that exist between its readers and itself. New subscribers by hundreds and thousands have joined our Family Circle in these last few months, and now the accessions have reached a point that is without precedent in the paper's history. We cannot regard this as other than a spontaneous endorsement of the great work which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the aid of its readers, has accomplished in the past; but it is equally a recognition of the unique position this journal occupies as the leading family religious weekly of America—independent, outspoken, liberal and just to all denominations, and unswervingly loyal to the old Gospel.

Our friends have no doubt observed that, during the last few months, the paper has been larger in almost every issue than during the same period in previous years. This has been due mainly to increased advertising patronage, and has resulted in a substantial benefit to our readers, as the aggregate number of pages of reading matter, outside of all advertising, has been very considerably increased.

Put in a nutshell, the total output of pages for the two months of August and September, 1910, has been twenty-eight pages over that of 1909, and the total reading matter (apart from all advertising) in the same months of 1910, has been 12¾ pages or nearly forty columns—representing an aggregate of some 30,800 words—more than that of these same months last year. In the present issue, there are twelve columns more for the general reader than in the issue of the same week a year ago. All of this increase in the literary attractiveness of the paper, which means, of course, added value to the reader, has been rendered possible chiefly by the increased advertising.

And here we would say a word as to our advertisers themselves. Aside from the fact, made clear above, that increased advertising enables us to give a larger and better paper—with more variety both in articles and illustrations and consequently more satisfaction to the general reader—the advertisements possess a special value in themselves. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD accepts no doubtful advertising. It rigidly draws the line at every advertisement which it cannot conscientiously guarantee to its readers. No subscriber to this journal is in the slightest danger of fraud, deception or disappointment from the advertisements it prints, since we have established the rule of guaranteeing all against loss through these means, if the claim be made within two months after publication.

We salute our readers! Foremost in the salutation do we include the Old Guard, who have advanced the banner of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on missions of mercy and helpfulness around the world these many years. A Young Guard is rapidly growing up under the old flag. Thousands have joined the reinforcements this season; thousands more are on the way. Already THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is read by a million readers in over 300,000 homes. We look forward to the day when, with the co-operation of our Family Circle, each bringing in a new member, not less than half a million homes shall welcome the weekly visit of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mr. Taft's Views on Ministers

ON a recent public occasion, President Taft expressed his views on the advantages of the ministry as a modern profession. Young men, he said, are not attracted to it now as formerly. The compensation is frequently inadequate, the influence of the preacher is not what it used to be, and the office no longer carries with it the distinctive character of sacredness. Mr. Taft, however, added that he looked for a reaction and for the reinforcement of the ministry by the entrance to the pulpit of men of greater native force. This he believed would be "after the wild rush for wealth has ceased"—which is almost equivalent to saying in a few hundred years or so. We do not think, however, that the President touched the real root of the matter. As far as pecuniary advantages go, there never were so many well-paid pastors as now. Our latest religious census shows a total of nearly 150,000 Protestant ministers of all denominations as against 99,000 in the previous decade, a growth of nearly 50 per cent. Church equipment and salaries have increased in proportion with the growth in population. While it is undeniable that there are many poorly paid preachers, this also is less in degree than formerly. This year, the country will pay $100,000,000 in ministerial salaries alone. Our own observation leads us to conclude that the real reason why so many churches are poorly supplied and why the ministerial calling has little attraction for some men is to be found in the teaching of our theological schools and colleges. Wherever the old Bible is dissected and the old Gospel teaching displaced by agnosticism, the result will be a crop of candidates who cannot bring to the work of the pulpit and the pastorate the stanch theological equipment, the zeal and consecration of men trained to walk in "the old paths." That there should be such failures is sad enough, but it is conclusive evidence of the truth that not fine philosophies nor brilliant essays nor even eloquent addresses will satisfy the spiritual needs of mankind. The Gospel alone will do that. It is the sure and only solvent of all the ministerial troubles spoken of by the President.

Punishing the Innocent

ONE of the most important topics, from a humanitarian point of view, discussed at the meeting of the International Congress in Washington to consider the suppression of crime and the treatment of the criminal, is the responsibility of the authorities for the families of prisoners whose bread-winners have been taken from them for a more or less extended period. As things now stand the prisoner is well housed, fairly well fed and put at some healthful occupation which gives him some exercise and keeps his mind from giving way under the fearful monotony of his existence. His family meanwhile is thrown on its own resources and compelled to find shelter and food as best it may. It has often been the boast of our legal lights that our laws were intended to correct and punish with the least likelihood of inflicting pain upon the innocent; but in this they have lamentably failed. One proposition made recently by a student of conditions in our penal institutions seems as if it might work well in practice to relieve, in part, the misery of the prisoner's family. In all of our institutions the prisoners are put at work; in some cases are taught trades, which would bring in good wages to a man working at them under the conditions of free labor. It is proposed that the man earn his own board and lodging—pay by labor, in other words, what it costs the State to keep him in confinement. This having been calculated, all that he earns above this amount to be paid him; that is, if he has a family, the extra amount he earns is to be paid over to them toward their support. If this were done, there would be less chance of the family "going on the town," to use a familiar expression.

The prisoner's wife and children have a claim to consideration, a claim which has been hithe ignored in a way which ought to spur our soc ogists and philanthropists to devising some pr tical way for their relief in the future.

As an enlightened nation proud of our phil thropies, we cannot escape the conviction that have punished more than the guilty in many ca and that so far as it can be remedied in a physi sense, it should be done. Unfortunately the men distress occasioned the family of the prisoner beyond human alleviation.

Now an Aeroplane War Fleet

IT is coming, as everybody knew it would—aeroplane war fleet. Already we seem to h the whirring of its wings overhead and to see mad gyrations of the fleet in its mid-air evolutio France, Germany, Italy and England are all gaged in a hot race for the mastery of the air, a now our government in Washington is seriou considering a proposition from wealthy, patric citizens to provide the army and navy with a fl of one thousand aeroplanes and dirigibles that w it is claimed, tremendously increase the offens and defensive powers of these two services. T proposed aerial reserve will be kept ready for stant service and will be under the control of ar and navy officers trained to the work. All of t most successful aeronauts in America are said be identified with the movement. While it is a mitted that the utility of the aeroplane in war still a very doubtful proposition, the recent n neuvres in France and elsewhere have demonstrat that, even incomplete as it is, it is capable of v uable service, not as a fighting machine, but f purposes of observation and the gaining of accura information, by mapping out and photographing t position of an enemy. No doubt an experime upon the large scale in contemplation will be pr ductive of many discouragements and setbacks. may cost many precious lives. Whether on t whole the use of airships will ultimately tend diminish the horrors of war or to increase them, is impossible now to predict. It may prove a fias for all practical purposes; or it may revolutioni war methods, just as the introduction of the iro clad and the high-power gun did a generation ag Who can tell?

General Notes

—DURING THE last twenty years, over 55,000 Catholics Austria have broken away from the Church of Rome a enrolled themselves as Protestants.

Jerry McAuley's Memorial

ON Sunday afternoon, September 18, there was held a Jerry McAuley memorial service in Printing House Square, New York City. The name of Jerry McAuley, the reformed criminal and champion of rescue mission work in New York, was known from ocean to ocean, and his influence in the old Jerry McAuley Water Street Mission will go on to eternity. The McAuley Water Street Mission in New York is a place for the most degraded and profligate criminals and drunkards, both men and women, where religious services are held every night and on Sunday afternoon. McAuley was at one time a river pirate. He was converted while a convict in Sing Sing Prison, and devoted the remainder of his life to the rescue of the most degraded and wretched in human society. The memorial service was held from the back if a Gospel wagon. A phonograph was used to lead the singing, and reproduced Gypsy Smith's hymns as a tribute to old "Jerry," the father of rescue missions. Between the hymns converts of the Jerry McAuley Mission told how they had been rescued from evil ways, and they took great joy in bearing testimony to Christ's ability to save the most wicked, wretched and abandoned of the earth. There were some well-dressed men in the crowd that gathered about the Gospel wagon, but large numbers were from the "down and out" class, some of whom had tears in their eyes as the story of God's love in saving others was told to them. Among other addresses were those by Superintendent John Wyburn, Bradford L. Gilbert, who married Jerry's widow, and Don O. Shelton, President of the National Bible Institute. From the dark background of the moral filth and crime of our great city life there stands out the beautiful rescue mission work, which is truly the voice of the living Christ calling to his wayward, unfortunate, unhappy children to come back to his heart. These missions are obedient to the command of the Saviour:

Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled. (Luke 14:23.)

A Beautiful Prayer

In his address before the Bible class of the Euclid Avenue Baptist Church in Cleveland the other Sunday morning, Mr. John D. Rockefeller read from a secular volume, "The Optimist's Good Morning," by Arthur L. Weatherby. With deep emotion and tremulous voice he read the closing paragraph as a prayer:

"Our Father, who art ever with us, help us this day to reveal thee through our common tasks, our relations with one another in our homes and at our work, that men may know and love thee better. This is thy most beautiful world. May we not mar its glory by our selfishness, but by the gentleness and sweetness of our lives make it more beautiful. May we this day not add to another's burden or care or pain. But may we, by our words and deeds, sweeten and brighten and strengthen the lives of those whom we meet. For thy goodness and mercy to us, for the opportunity of service, for love and sympathy, we thank thee, and pray that our devotion to thy truth may reveal the thankfulness of our hearts."

"Beautiful sentiments," said Mr. Rockefeller, holding the book in his hand, as the class was leaving the room. This prayer is in imitation of the part of the prayer of Our Lord which says:

Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Matt. 6:10.)

Oldest Christian Church

A telegram from Jerusalem indicates that recent excavations on the summit of the Mount of Olives have uncovered the remains of a Christian church which flourished about sixteen hundred years ago. The floor of the nave is still buried, that of the transepts is entirely exposed; it is of mosaic and is perfectly preserved. The south transept contains a baptismal pool. A single tombstone has been discovered bearing the inscription "Theodorus" in Greek letters. In the chancel there are two separate mosaic floors of different designs, one thirty inches above the other. The lower is considered to be a floor of St. Helena's Church, dating from the year 330, while the upper floor is a restoration by the Crusaders. The site is presumed to have been selected as the spot fixed by the oldest tradition as the place where Christ taught his disciples to pray. What an appropriate place for a Christian church, the Mount of Olives, which was pressed by Christ's loving footsteps and those of his disciples, which echoed his words of truth and love, and which witnessed the awful agony of his soul in his conflict with sin for the salvation of the world!

And he came out, and went, as he was wont, to the Mount of Olives; and his disciples also followed him. . . . And he was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast, and kneeled down, and prayed, saying, Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me; nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done. (Luke 22:39-42.)

A Young Inventor

Fires from imperfect insulation are almost without number in this country. Conflagrations from such a source are hereafter likely to be very rare. H. Luke Owen, a young mechanic who has been struggling for years on a small income, set himself earnestly to work to discover a fibrous fireproof covering for wire. After several years of experiment he hit upon a successful combination of materials. He submitted his invention to the General Electric Company of Schenectady, which tested the discovery and found that the most intense heat applied to the wire protected by the new covering proved it absolutely indestructible. The company offered the young man $100,000 for the sole right to use the invention, which offer he accepted. In addition, Owen is to receive a handsome salary for superintending the manufacture of his new discovery. Against the fires of temptation, sin and retribution there is protection in the divine presence and in the Saviour's love, as mirrored in the fiery furnace of old.

He answered and said, Lo, I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt; and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God. (Dan. 3:25.)

Faithful Servants Rewarded

Two beautiful benevolences of a similar character were reported by the newspapers on the same day. One was gifts by the will of Mrs. Mary Nevins Mayo, who after having given liberally to St. Luke's Hospital, and the Home for Old Men and Aged Couples in New York, and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals in New York, left to her servants as follows: Mary Flannigan, $6,000; Mary Mahony, $1,000; and Rosanna Summerset, $1,000. A similar benevolence was that of Mrs. Julia De Windt Thompson, wife of Dr. Thompson of Ferris Lane, a suburb of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., who gave a house free of all encumbrance to Kate Brown, who had been a model servant in her home for many years. Mrs. Thompson sent for a surveyor some time ago and had him measure off a generous piece of land next to her residence. She built an attractive and substantial house upon the lot, which Kate Brown thought was to be for sale or rent. Mrs. Thompson surprised her servant by walking into the kitchen one day and giving her a deed to the property free and clear of all encumbrance, where she and her daughter will live and still be ready to continue the loyal service rendered so many years. The Thompsons have a New York City home as well as their country seat. The servant problem is by all odds the most perplexing one in domestic life in this country. Numbers of untrained servants offer themselves and are received in the homes of the land, and spoil the food and the digestion, and are causes of perpetual irritation and expense. On the other hand, there are many mistresses who are irritable, domineering, unkind, and unchristian to their help, and merit all the domestic trouble which the "misfit" in the kitchen or home may produce. Where servants are as faithful as the ones to whom we have referred and employers are as kind, considerate, just and generous as the ones employing them, there need be no difficulty about settling the problem of domestic help in American life. Whether services in this life are properly appreciated or rewarded or not, it is certain that the Christian serves a Master who will give a full return for every service rendered, and also a bountiful reward at the last.

His lord said unto him, Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord. (Matt. 25:23.)

Instruction to Farmers

Special farmers' instruction trains during the last of August and first of September were sent out by the Pennsylvania Railroad, especially through the States of Indiana and Ohio. The one in Indiana gave the farmers an opportunity to hear lectures on the methods for improving wheat by experts from the Purdue Experiment Station. These talks treated of the selection of varieties of wheat, fertilizers, control of plant diseases, methods of combating insects and cultivating the soil. The train consisted of an engine, two coaches fitted up as audience rooms, and a car for those accompanying it. One hundred and fifty-six stations were visited, and thirty-minute lectures were delivered at each place in the coaches. The train in Ohio consisted of an engine and three lecture cars, which were filled with audiences listening to the instruction of the speaker. In most of the States traversed by the Pennsylvania system the same process of instruction has been carried on for the past three or four years. The enormous drift from the farms to the cities which has been going on for a quarter of a century, and which now amounts to an avalanche, has been at the expense of the farms, and there must be a flowing back of the population to the country, if we would preserve the best national character and success. The trolleys and automobiles will probably promote this reaction and send more people back to the agricultural districts. We must have not only more farmers but better farming, with increased acreage and productiveness, to keep pace with the tremendous increase of population in this country. We have come to the time when nearly all our wheat crop is necessary for bread to feed ourselves, and if we would have any for export, any with which to feed the rest of the world, we must have more acres and more wheat to the acre. The farmer's wheat instruction trains are in the right direction. The sowing of the grain and the thrift of the wheat farmer furnished Christ an illustration for his lesson of the sowing of truth in the human heart and its growth to a bountiful harvest.

But other fell into good ground and brought forth fruit, some an hundredfold, some sixtyfold, some thirtyfold. (Matt. 13:8.)

HOW TO TREAT THE CRIMINAL

FROM a sociological point of view there has been no more important gathering this year than that of the International Prison Commission, which started its sessions in New York City, and, after a brief tour of the country as the guest of our government, continued them in Washington. Over fifty different nations sent delegates, and at the first meeting for organization, held in the Herald Square Hotel, the delegates from China could be seen sitting by the side of a big burly man of science from Russia, while a man from New Zealand found his next neighbor to be from some republic in South America. All countries suffer from crime and the consequent loss of life and property, and the problem of one is the problem of all, allowing of course for some variations arising from differences in government and from the fact that political problems sometimes affect questions relating to crime. At the meetings of the Congress methods of punishment and reform are compared, and one country learns from another of its successes or failures in its trial of new systems which are being introduced constantly at the suggestion of government officials, philanthropists, or sociologists.

The delegates were received in New York by Frederick H. Mills, financial director of the Commission. At the brief organizing session Frederick O. A. Woxen, of Christiania, Norway, presided. He is secretary-general of the Department of Justice in his own country, where he has the general oversight of the entire prison system. After organizing, the delegates adjourned to go to the City Hall to receive an official welcome to the metropolis. Acting-Mayor Mitchel received them, as Mayor Gaynor was still at his farm recuperating from the effects of the wound he received several weeks ago. Mr. Mitchel said in his speech of welcome that the delegates would find in New York City a field for their studies which was without a parallel, and that the people of New York were ever ready to pour out money to relieve the unfortunate of the community both through governmental institutions and private philanthropies. He pointed out the fact that the delegates would find such a diversity of institutions as would justify them in the expenditure of the entire time of the Congress in the city of New York.

The speech in reply was made by Professor Van der Aa, head of the delegation from Holland and commissioner of the ancient university of Groningen. He spoke in excellent English, and said that they had already seen much of New York, the most important place in the United States, and he voiced the wonder and admiration of the delegates for its wonderful progress and development. He referred feelingly to the fact that it was a countryman of his own, Peter Block, who built the first house on Manhattan, and that similar ones, left over from a former age, could still be seen in the older parts of the city and in Brooklyn.

After receiving the hospitality of the Gateway to the Western world, the delegates were taken in charge by the representatives of the national government, and a trip was made as guests of the nation through a number of States before the sessions were again opened on October 3 in Washington. A special train was boarded at Jersey City and the delegates were taken to see the best prisons and reformatory institutions this side of the Mississippi, including those at Elmira and Auburn, N. Y., the Indiana Reformatory at Jeffersonville, Ind., the Ohio State Reformatory, and others. Stops were made also at Niagara Falls, Indianapolis and Chicago. Fifty American delegates acted as guides for the foreign visitors, and the members of the Commission received more invitations from mayors and Chambers of Commerce than they could possibly accept; but they showed heartfelt appreciation of the American hospitality, which would certainly have ruined their digestion if they had not hurried on to the next scheduled stopping place. President Taft accepted an invitation to address their first session in Washington, and its proceedings will be watched with great interest, as it is the first Congress of the kind ever held within the borders of the United States.

A Group of Delegates to the Congress to Consider the Treatment of Criminals

As it is estimated that crime costs the people of the United States no less than $1,000,000,000 a year; that through it lives are lost and families disrupted, anything dealing with such a stupendous subject is of importance to all thoughtful men and women who have the welfare of their country at heart. There are about 100,000 prisoners in our various penal institutions, and about 33,000 are discharged every year; but unfortunately others take their places.

Among the various subjects scheduled for discussion during the Congress are the following:

Is the death penalty longer advisable for capital crimes?

Is the indeterminate sentence feasible?

What shall be the procedure regarding penal sentences pronounced by courts of foreign lands when the prisoner is again in his own country?

Is a crime a more serious one when a group commits it than when a single person commits it?

What are the essential principles of a modern reformatory system?

What improvement can be made in systems of parole or conditional liberation?

What are the best means of working prisoners in small prisons?

What are the effects of probation?

What can be done to assist prisoners' families?

How can we best deal with inebriety?

Should children be treated as criminals?

What can be done about idle and vagrant children in large cities?

Wandering Thoughts

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

HOW far are we responsible for thoughts and fancies beyond our control which intrude upon our sacred hours, disturb us in our prayers and sometimes frighten us by their suggestions of blasphemy? The question was sent some weeks ago by a reader of this page and was answered by the editor in a personal letter. Since then the suggestion has been made that as many good people are troubled to the point of distress and made unhappy because they grieve over the sinfulness of their thoughts, it might be well to touch upon it in one of our weekly talks. No doubt it is a prolific source of that haunting melancholy which sweeps down upon the soul and drives it to despair, if it is not dissipated by the genial sunshine of faith and the atmosphere of common sense. First, let us take notice that many influences are at work around us which we can neither discern nor estimate. St. Paul said, "We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers." The world of the supernatural lies very near our visible world. When Christian, in Bunyan's immortal book, the Pilgrim's Progress, was passing through the Valley of the Shadow he was assailed on every side by voices which seemed to whisper in his ear, by hobgoblins and fiends from the pit. This description of spiritual darkness is subtle and graphic, and if we believe that God sends his people help from the throne in time of need, we have no reason to despair because of these assaults of the enemy. In plain words, we live in a world where evil and good are in conflict; we are the victims of inherited tendencies, and we are not invariably responsible for our wandering thoughts.

Next, let us bear in mind that a weakened physical state, a disordered liver and the infirmities of advancing years, each and all or each in turn account for depression of spirit and inability to control thought. In old-fashioned memoirs we used to find repeated entries remorsefully regretful over sin. If the saints who confessed their sinfulness in terms of exaggeration had not been sufferers from dyspepsia, or had they been able to take normal exercise and secure normal sleep, they would not have been so morbid. We find nowhere in God's Word the least warrant for an abject approach to our heavenly Father. He bids us stand up in his presence, or come to him with the loving confidence of children. If we could take to our hearts the sweet sense of his forgiving love we should not worry about our thoughts and imagination. As Faber says:

> If our hearts were but more simple
> We should take Him at His word,
> And our lives would be all sunshine
> In the sweetness of our Lord.

Again, the best way to overcome the morbid tendency is not to think about ourselves, not to pull our motives to pieces, not to be introspective, but to look away from ourselves to Jesus Christ. The four little rules of Dr. Edward Everett Hale are helpful for everyday living.

> Look out, and not in;
> Look up, and not down;
> Look forward, and not back,
> And lend a hand.

Another rule is "In everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, to make our requests known unto God."

The School Luncheon When children carry their luncheon to school pains should be taken to put it up in an attractive shape as well as from day to day to afford them some variety. Sandwiches, of course, form the basis of the school luncheon. If they are made with nicety nothing can be more delicious, but thick slices of bread unevenly buttered, with ragged pieces of cold ham or chunks of beef, are not appetizing after a morning spent in the class-room. A hungry boy working out of doors from breakfast until noon is able to eat anything wholesome whether its appearance is tempting or the reverse. The case is different with children in the schoolroom, toiling at high pressure, eagerly competing with one another and ambitious to gain the largest number of points in their weekly test. Bread and butter form excellent sandwiches without any special filling, if the bread is cut thin. Hard boiled eggs, a little fruit, ginger snaps and a cup custard would make a very satisfactory meal at noon. Sandwiches may be filled with cream or club cheese, peanut butter, lettuce leaves, jelly or a mixture of chopped olives and nuts. The house-mother may be too busy to prepare a really tempting luncheon every day with her own hands. If there is a home daughter the duty may fall upon her. Be assured that it is worth while to be careful about your child's noonday meal, if the school is too distant to permit a return in the middle of the day.

BLACK-EYED SUSANS

Black-eyed Susans in the meadow,
More than little hands can hold,
Rippling waves of sun and shadow,
Glance and shimmer fold on fold,
While the children and the flowers
Share the season's shining gold.

Reopening a House When a house has been closed for several weeks it should be thoroughly aired in every room and closet from attic to cellar before it is again occupied. All basins should be flushed. It is well to let the water run through the pipes for a good half hour, so that no lurking germs may be set free and make trouble. If, before the house was closed, care was taken to leave no vegetable matter to decay, there will be little danger in reopening it. No precautions can be too great in reference to a cellar which has been closed. Fresh air is a remedial agent beyond price.

Engaging a New Maid A very large part of the trouble which housekeepers experience in the adjustments of domestic help would be obviated if the first interview between mistress and maid were businesslike. The duties and privileges of the maid should be clearly defined. She has a positive right to certain afternoons out, and, if possible, her evenings should always be free after the evening meal. No woman can be expected to work with good temper and without fatigue from six in the morning until ten at night. Wages should not be given for inexpert service on the scale which is demanded justly by a woman who is capable, skilful and efficient. The whole system is set jarring at the outset, because in engaging the maid, nine times out of ten the employer does not seem to know what she ought to expect, grant or pay for. When women learn to manage this department of home life on business principles we shall hear far fewer complaints from both sides.

A Young Woman's Puzzle Several friends have recently inquired how they may improve a deficient youthful education. The letter that follows shows one of the many contrasting aspects of this problem:

"I had completed my sophomore year in the high school when I had the misfortune to fall and injure my knee. The result was the loss of school for a year. When I was again able to attend, my classmates had gone so far ahead of me that I foolishly decided to stay at home altogether. Seven years have passed and now at twenty-three I wish to resume my school work. My parents oppose this and tell me that I would be an object of ridicule to the young people with whom I would study. I am engaged to be married and my fiancé is reluctant to wait until I shall have completed a course of study. What should I do?"

At twenty-three you are not venerable. Still, you might find yourself somewhat at odds with boys and girls from fourteen to sixteen. This ought not to stand in your way, if there were really a valid reason for your going back to school. Your parents, on the whole, are right in the position they take, although I think they overstate the case. You would soon be accepted on your merits, and the good-natured amusement, if expressed at all, would wear itself out in a day or two. Your fiancé has a claim that you cannot ignore. Why should you wish him to wait for the home and the settled life which he anticipates with you, while you pore over history, geometry and Latin? My advice is that you study housekeeping, prepare your trousseau and set the wedding day. Fix it at an early date. Marriage often proves in itself a higher education than any other.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Corner

—ELIZABETH. I do not wonder that you are heart-broken and desolate, and that it seems as though you cannot live without the husband who has been your lover through all the years. After a while this may be a comfort to you, that no one can take from you the memory of his devotion and the sweetness of the love that was yours in such rich measure. It may be easier, too, for you to live without him than it would have been for him to live without you. Rest and hope in the thought that the will of God is best, and that broken ties are reunited in the Better Land.

UNCLE SAM'S NEW FRUIT FARM

A Merry Flat-Car Excursion

House Beneath a Rock Near Oroville, Calif.

Happy Celebrators

CENTRAL California is having dreams this fall. And when the descendants of the Argonauts have dreams they are intense. Those dreams tell of rivaling the southern part of the Golden State in the raising of fruit and as a winter home for Eastern people, who follow the setting sun to find abodes where Medicine Hat is unknown, and where the roses bloom and the live oaks keep their leaves the year around. For many years, the people of the great fertile valleys of Central California have seen Los Angeles and San Diego flourish. They have witnessed the steady roll of home-seekers across the continent to come to rest on the borders of the Pacific along the southern coast. But all this time, Central California, the placé where the discovery of gold brought to the State its first migration from beyond the Rockies, has remained nearly stationary, while the more fortunate regions to the south have been transformed into populous cities, vast orchards, and palatial homes.

"It is because we cannot ship our fruit to market," some said. It is because our railroads do not advertise Central California as they do Southern California," said others.

"Our fruit is as good, if not better, than they raise further south," said all together. "The year around our climate is better." And to that statement, of course, everybody in Central California agreed.

When the Western Pacific, purely a road of Central California, was opened for traffic last month—giving another great transcontinental line to the East—these enthusiastic descendants of the gold-seekers paid no attention to the speed limit in their vociferous outbursts of joy.

From the Nevada line to Oakland, it was one magnificent celebration. Every brass band within twenty miles of the new road was there to greet the first train. Offerings of fruit were showered upon the visitors who came in the first train. Speeches were made at every crossroad until the train could stop no longer, and then a wild outburst of cheering welcomed it as it dashed by. All business was suspended in Oakland, and an industrial parade three miles long greeted the visitors on their arrival at the railroad end of their trip of 927 miles from Salt Lake City.

The dream of the people of Central California began five years ago when the Gould Lines first started work in building from Salt Lake to the coast. They saw, or thought they saw, that the new line would undertake at once the work of upbuilding Central California that the railroads had done for Southern California. On the pledge that this would be the policy of the new line, rights of way were almost donated to the new road through nearly all the principal cities along its route. Nothing was too good for the men who were building the road. In many cities, where progress had been slow for a decade, new buildings began to go up. Real estate, long a drug on the market, began to move again with rising prices. The sun shines bright in Central California these days, and well it may.

The new road opens up a wide region which has hitherto been inaccessible. It traverses valleys, after crossing the Nevada line, which need only transportation to make them the homes of a prosperous people. The low mountain ranges are admirably adapted to irrigation projects, but none have been undertaken on any large scale, because the region was too far from market after the products had been raised.

The Day the New Railroad Opened

The new road after leaving Salt Lake City skirts the southern shore of the Great Salt Lake much as the Union Pacific cuts through the northern part of that mysterious body of water. When it was built its tracks were run over dry land, or rather dry salt. Everybody believed that Salt Lake was drying up and would soon be only a few spots of water here and there. The water had been receding for many years, and the railroad engineers had no hesitancy in laying their road over what a decade ago had been the bottom of the lake. In all that they were mightily mistaken. Salt Lake stopped drying up. Instead, the water began to rise. It came up to the tracks, and one day last winter a north wind kicked up a furious sea. When the storm was over, miles of railroad, laid with so much confidence, were piled up and twisted around long distances from the lines laid out by the engineers. Again the tracks were laid, but this time they were protected by countless trainloads of rock.

After leaving the lake, the Western Pacific soon runs into a field of salt 97 per cent. pure, which is some fifteen miles wide and over sixty miles long. The railroad runs for forty-six miles through the centre of this field of salt in a straight line. As one glances out of the car windows the effect is the same as riding over a vast field of ice and snow.

Beyond the great basin of Salt Lake, the new line begins to climb to get over a small range of mountains, and then takes its way over the sage-brush deserts of Utah and Nevada. It is said that the vast region can be irrigated and become prosperous and populous, but that requires much imagination. Its chief purpose now seems to be to furnish roadbeds between the Rockies and the Coast ranges for the railroads.

It is a different story after one passes the California line, and the road approaches the magic region of the Golden State where the Feather River has its source. Here are valleys ready for man's ingenuity and capital to transform them into gardens of great fertility. Here are mining regions waiting for cheap transportation to be worked successfully. The new road passes over the Divide through a tunnel about 6,000 feet long at a low pass, some 2,000 feet lower than the pass over the Sierras selected by C. P. Huntington for the Central Pacific. There the new road strikes the canyon of the Feather River, and follows it for 150 miles to the rich valley at Oroville.

It is on these 150 miles through the canyon that the best scenery not only on that road, but also in California, is found. The grade is exactly one per cent., or fifty-two feet per mile. The road crosses and recrosses the canyon many times on steel bridges in this long descent to the level of the Central Californian valleys at Oroville. At many points there is not room enough in the canyon for the railroad and the river, and the road is supported by solid walls of masonry above the torrential stream beneath. The Sierras rise mightily on either side of the canyon, which passes through one of the great timber reserves of the Federal government on its way down to the valleys. Feather River was famous in the early days of California, and countless dollars were taken from its banks. Many of the early settlers are still living, and when the first train passed over the new road they came for a score of miles to see it.

Some of them shed tears in their excitement over being permitted, they said, to live until a railroad should come near their mountain homes. The entire population of many of the mountain towns came to see the train, bringing their mayors and brass bands with them. They hugged the trainmen, and shouted after the train had passed until they were out of hearing.

A region as large as many European principalities has been opened to development by the new

'UST after the close of the war in 1865, early one morning there came a loud ringing at the pas- tal door. The pastor himself was e only one of the household even rtly dressed. He hurried out, in ssing-gown and slippers, to find re a fine-looking fellow, who an- unced himself as of the same name his own. He also gave the name d military rank of an elder brother om the minister had known in a mer pastorate in a distant State. ere was a frank and manly way out the stranger which inspired con- ence. He went on to say, "Till day fore yesterday I was a captain, with r years of service to my credit. I s then honorably discharged. But e story is too long. I am in an aw- hurry. I will tell it you as we le, for I want you to get into my car- ge for a four-mile drive. Please not stop to get your breakfast."

The pastor, who had been an army aplain, was not unaccustomed to dden emergencies. So he was eedily in the carriage behind a pair lively bays. Once fairly under way, oking at his companion, he said in- iringly:

"Well, what is it?"

"Why, this is it: I knew of you our division in the army. I had ard my brother speak of you often. ily a week or two ago I happened to rn that you were settled here. That counts for my appearance at your or with my errand. Mustered out, I told you, I took the first train t of Washington for your neighbor- g city, got myself into civilian rig d drove out to our present destina- n to find the object of my trip. She as teaching some miles away. I drove ere at once, found her and asked her very vital question. She referred e, as I believe is the habit of mod- est and dutiful daughters, to her parents. The result of it all is that you are going with me to perform a marriage service before breakfast this morning."

"But you've been four years in the Western Army. How did you get acquainted with this girl in the East?"

"I never laid eyes on her till half-past seven last night. Drove over here at earliest daylight, routed up the town clerk, got a license, and want to be married before breakfast."

"Pretty quick work, that. Pray explain it all."

"Well, while serving in North Carolina we had sharp tussles with the enemy. In one of them I was severely wounded and had to be left behind with a lot of other damaged boys in a temporary hospital, scantily provided, you may be sure. We lay there in pretty rough case till our thoughtful commanders at the front sent down to us a lot of sanitary goods. Ah, the dainties which those boxes contained! And the things to put on to replace the rags to which our uniforms were reduced; and the coverings for our rough cots!

"But the best of all was an autograph quilt, which was spread like a benediction on my miserable couch. Each block of it had in its centre the name of the woman who made it. I amused myself for many an hour poring over those names, picturing how the good women looked and blessing the busy hands that wrote those names.

"That quilt, by the grace of God, is what brought me here. Somehow (sort of telepathy, don't you think?)—somehow the name on the central block of all seemed to attract me more than any of the others. The hospital steward coming along one day, I asked him if there didn't happen to be some letters with the boxes? He said that

LADY HENRY SOMERSET
The prominent social reform advocate, says:
"Sanatogen undoubtedly restores sleep, invigorates the nerves and braces the patient to health. I have watched its effect on people whose nervous systems have been entirely undermined and I have proved Sanatogen to be most valuable."

A remarkable letter from the famous author of "The Heavenly Twins," SARAH GRAND:
"I began to take Sanatogen after nearly four years' enforced idleness from extreme debility, and felt the benefit almost immediately. And now, after taking it steadily three times a day for twelve weeks, I find myself able to enjoy both work and play again, and also able to do as much of both as I ever did."

The REV. R. BROOK LANDER
Bishop of the Free Church of England, says:
"I have derived very great benefit from the Sanatogen in convalescence after influenza. I have recommended it to several friends."

HALL CAINE
The dramatist:
"My experience of Sanatogen has been that as a nerve food it has on more than one occasion benefited me."

Renewed Nervous Energy for the Worn Mind and Body

EVERY DAY brings new cares and worries, just as it brings new joys and pleasures. Nature's balance is marvelously adjusted. Where you destroy, you construct; where you tear down, you rebuild.

Each duty demands its toll. You must pay your way every day. Thus, when you have depleted your nerve force, exhausted your bodily vigor and sapped your strength, you need a tonic to re-energize—a food to rebuild—you need there was one from the secretary of the woman's circle that sent it. 'Let me see that letter,' said I. He brought it. It was written by her of that central block in the magic quilt.

"It was a beautiful letter, full of sympathy and patriotism. I devoured it. I was convalescing by this time, and whiled away hours in framing imaginary epistles to that secretary. Finally my imaginary letter materialized. It was written in my very best style. In the name of all the boys I thanked her and the good ladies of her circle for their care for us soldier lads, telling her how the contents of the boxes had cheered and heartened and done us worlds of good. Then I told her how my fancies had played around that central name on my quilt. Just my level best went into that letter. Questions went in that might appeal to her sympathies and compel her to reply. Well, she did answer, and her letter was sweet, womanly, full of patriotism and loyal admiration for the brave men who were suffering and periling their all for country-love. She had read all but the purely personal part of my effusion to the ladies of the group. They had instructed her to respond on their behalf. So she was doing it. I liked that letter and at once set about framing another in such sort as to secure further replies, and made good again. So I kept on with more and more of interest and enthusiasm till I became thoroughly enamored of the correspondent.

"When I was far enough recovered to get the welcome recall to my regiment in the field for the last great campaign of the war I got a fresh suit of captain's uniform, had my photograph taken in it, and wrote to Lizzie that I was starting back for service in what I believed was the last grand struggle of the war,—that I hoped to come out of it alive and sound—but who could tell? I asked her to accept my picture. Would she, in the kindness of her heart, grant me her own in return? I would keep it next my heart as a shield. At any rate, it would be a mighty comfort to me on many a weary march and perilous field. She did, bless her! I liked the picture as well as I had loved the letters. Their sweet and gracious spirit shone out of her eye and lighted the face as if she looked on me so. Here it is. See for yourself."

And he drew it from his bosom, "Where I have always kept it," he said.

"Back in he field there was no lack of incident, stirring or pathetic, with which to fill the channels of a constant correspondence. Presently I felt deeply the growing interest, and —something more! I told her that so soon as the war was over, if I lived and if she did not forbid it, I was coming to see her. She issued no prohibitions. So now I have kept my word, and you are to make me the happiest old soldier of all the armies this morning."

"But what did the old folks say when you two presented yourselves in this new role?"

"Oh, they asked me some questions; but they had heard so much of my letters that they knew pretty well my record. They asked Lizzie some pertinent questions, too, and finally said that whatever she decided they would not object. Bless them, too! But it cost them some tears.

"Then came the tug of war. I had to tell them—and her—that my brother in a far Western city, midway between the Mississippi Valley and the Pacific Coast, owned a daily paper; that his editor had died, so he was in a very tight place and I must go at once to take charge of the work. I had telegraphed him that I would e there at the very earliest possible o- ment; therefore I must go, immedi- e- ly after the marriage ceremony s morning, for the noon train from e city. They were startled. 'Why,' s they, 'Lizzie has no bridal outfit!' d matter for that. The less baggage o better. We shall have a long, ro e stage journey of it after leaving h Mississippi. I'll take care of the e- fit when we get to our destination. y bride shall not be ashamed of her g r out there.' So they and she consen l, and we are to have a farmer's bre- n fast and start at once for that n train and the far West this mo- ing."

By this time they had reached e good deacon's house. The preacher t- terviewed Lizzie alone, and the fat r and mother also by themselves. e told of her perfect love and trust, d they gave their full consent. The n- riage ceremony was solemnized; t y had their wedding breakfast, its y something mingled with the salt f tears. Then the parents saw the y- turous pair launched on their long e journey. The bridal trunk was las d behind the carriage, and so amid te s, smiles and benedictions they di e away.

Do you care to know further? r years that pastor knew nothing f their fates. His own had carried n to San Francisco. One Sunday mo- ing he noticed in his congregatio a stranger whose face was dimly fa- iar. When the collection plates w e laid at his feet on the platform a bright double eagle caught his e. (Such pieces are apt to do that if t y happen to get on the plate at an o - nary Sunday morning offering.) t the close of the service the stran , instead of passing out of the chu h with the crowd, came up the ai , reaching out his hand in eager gr - ing of the pastor.

"Don't you know me?" he asl. "Don't you remember a hurried w- ding which you solemnized in ——?

"Indeed, I do! You are Capt n F——," was the reply.

"Yes. I had some business in S- ramento, and learning you were h , I came down to see you and tell p that if you had never done anot r good thing in your life, what you d that day was worth having lived : I've the best wife in the whole wo l, and she's foolish enough to think t t she has got a very decent sort of h- band." Then a broad smile oversprd his face as he added: "And we nam our eldest boy for you. He bears y r full name. My paper is the m t prosperous between the Valley and e Coast, and we have been blessed n every other way. I just wanted o see you and tell you these things, a d to give you the love of my wife a d the whole family." And he went b k to his home and its felicities.

Years later the pastor had gone o an Eastern ministry, but was in S n Francisco on a visit to one of his l elders, when a ring at the door brou t him word that two gentlemen were n the parlor. They declined to give th r names. They begged that the din r be not interrupted, as they were n no haste and wanted a "good lo talk" with the minister. So the m l was leisurely finished and the mi- ter, entering the room, met once m e Captain F——, and a young fel as tall as he, whom the captain p- sented as "that boy, your namesak

They urged the preacher to v t their city and home on his return o the East, promising to take h through Yellowstone Park and o give him the finest hunting and fi- ing in all the world, as the young man was an expert in field and ca .

War on False Weights

AN official crusade against false weights and measures has been in progress in New York for several weeks. The Bureau of Weights and Measures has sent its officers into all the markets and into hundreds of stores and other places of business and the result has been the seizure of thousands of false measures, of basket-work, woodwork or metal, and of a very large assortment of different kinds of scales. It is hardly necessary to explain that these measures, scales and weights had all been "doctored" to the disadvantage of the public. In many cases the measures had false sides and bottoms, the scales were "leaded" and the weights several ounces less in the pound than the law requires. There have been a number of arrests, but in most cases, confiscation and a warning have sufficed to discourage the dishonest purveyors—for a time, at least.

Here is some of the advice to housewives and buyers generally which Commissioner Driscoll, of the Bureau of Weights and Measures, has circulated for public benefit:

"Don't allow the selling tradesman to steady the scales with his hands.

"Don't allow your grocer or dairyman to weigh in the wooden butter dish when he is weighing your butter.

"Don't let the fancy package goods fascinate you, because you are frequently paying heavily for the fancy package.

"Don't buy in small quantities if you can avoid it.

"Don't gossip with your merchant while he is weighing your purchases unless you are absolutely sure of his honesty.

"Do your own purchasing.

"Don't leave your shopping till the last minute and then buy in a hurry.

"Don't neglect to test the weight of package goods at home and compare them with the weight of the same commodity purchased loose."

early settlers, and of "Evangeline," of Longfellow fame. They gave to the Bishop of London an exquisite bunch of flowers. At Annapolis Royal all the people had looked for the bringing of the "King George Bible," the king's gift to the parish, where Rural Dean How is rector. The Presbyterian minister and people, the Methodist and Baptist ministers and all their people were on hand. With beautiful and sympathetic interest the addresses were arranged to be given in the field in the afternoon and evening. Bishop Worrell spoke in the afternoon, also the Bishop of Washington, D. C., the Bishop of Toronto, and Archdeacon Raymond of St. Johns. In a pouring rain the whole assembly went to the cemetery to the grave of the man who two hundred years before began the services of the Church. A monument to his memory was uncovered, and his name—Rev. Thomas Wood—cut on the stone. The inscription tells of his work in a few fitting words. The Bishop of London spoke and placed upon that lonely grave the flowers the children gave him the day before at "Evangeline's Well."

At night the rain descended and open-air celebration in the electric-lighted field had to be abandoned. Service was held in three churches and all were crowded. The Bishop of London had taken the Bible to the parish church, where the Lord Bishop of Glasgow preached. In the Methodist Church the Bishop of Toronto preached and in the Presbyterian Church Dr. William Wilkinson preached.

So ended the week. Some representatives go from Canada to England, others come to the United States to attend the Convention of the Church at Cincinnati. The Lord Bishop of Winchester, grand-nephew of the poet Wordsworth, arrives this week and preaches in Trinity Church on Sunday next. He is generally regarded as the greatest living Latin scholar in the English Church. Bishop Wordsworth, in addition to preaching for Rev. Dr. Manning at Trinity Church, is to give a course of lectures at the Divinity School in Chicago, and will preach at the epening of the General Convention in Ohio.

Never Disappointing

I am writing just a line to say I have been taking THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for only a short time and have decided that I have never had any more or better enjoyment and pleasure with my earnings than from this $1.50. It is something to look forward for each week, and it is never disappointing.

A Bowery Mission Trophy

By J. G. Hallimond, Superintendent

A FIERCE August sun had blazed down upon the city until the flags of the sidewalk resembled heated furnace plates. It was an atmosphere conducive to blues, biliousness, lazy languor, and a dark and ugly pessimism.

A tall, stalwart, and respectably-dressed man walked down the Bowery. He was affected not only by the weather, but by the poisonous ravages upon his body and mind of alcoholic liquor, and by utter despair of the soul. He was a stranger to the Bowery. His mind was so preoccupied that he did not even know he was walking through the world-famous thoroughfare. A mist seemed to curl itself around everything. The street was in its usually crowded state, but he saw no human face. As he walked unsteadily onward, the frown upon his brow grew deeper. The one remedy for his ills that for years he had struggled with and kept at arm's length, now seemed to form itself into definite shape, and to force itself upon his attention with grim and irrepressible persistency. It was suicide.

He came to a standstill. Standing on the edge of the curb, and involuntarily raising his hat, as though to ease the pressure upon his brain, he exclaimed:

"Great God, has it come to this? I am an utter failure! I must end it all."

What was it that caused him to turn clear round and face the buildings instead of the street? What but the good Spirit of God, who with sleepless eye had been watching him through all his anxious cares and tragic troubles! For there, in white letters, that seemed whiter than ever through the black darkness of the hour, appeared the words

"BOWERY MISSION. WELCOME."

He had heard of the Bowery Mission when away in the far Northwest. His thoughts were arrested, and for a moment his burden of woe was forgotten. A notice concerning the Labor Bureau attracted his attention. This touched the need of his material life. He wanted something to do. The poignant agony of the realization that he was useless, and about to be flung upon the scrap-heap of humanity, was the twin spectre of that other gloomy fact, viz.: that he was the helpless slave of a degrading habit. The notice on the Mission door seemed but the smallest kind of rift in the clouds; but it brought a glimpse of hope to his heart; so, after passing and repassing the place several times, he entered. And as, with slow and uncertain step, this crushed and heart-broken man passed into the dingy room which then provided a temporary quarters for the Bowery Mission, he crossed the threshold of a new epoch; he entered the confines of a bright, happy, and abundantly useful life.

He had for many years been a priest of the Catholic Church in the great Northwest diocese. He was industrious, conscientious, devoted in his work, and much beloved by his people. Then the love of drink, reaching through the sacred barriers, seized him in its grasp. Insidiously the habit grew upon him. In the course of a few years, it became inveterate. Then came gentle and tender remonstrances from the broad-minded, sympathetic archbishop, entreaties from his closest friends, then expostulations and stern warnings, but all of no avail. Then came the end. He was unfrocked and thrown outside the pale.

What was he to do? Totally unfitted for business life, without means of subsistence except that charitably offered by relatives, which he was too honorable to accept, he drifted from city to city, until he reached New York. The mad craving for drink followed him every step of the way, up to the very moment he entered the Mission on that memorable August day.

The first man he encountered inside the Mission doors was Mr. Hunt, manager of the Labor Bureau, who himself had entered the place some ten years ago under somewhat similar circumstances. There was nothing perfunctory about Mr. Hunt's handshake and cheery words. There is little doubt that it was this genial and brotherly reception that led to the man's immediate and sound conversion. Mr. Hunt, after half an hour's talk with him, brought me out of my private office, and introduced me. We three knelt in earnest prayer. The visitor rose a changed man. From that moment, drink has never been touched, even thought of by him, except with repugnance. For eleven months he served the Mission faithfully in the Labor Bureau. It was part of his work to dispatch farm hands from the various railroad depots, buying their tickets, giving them kindly counsel, and sending them off with hope and cheer in their hearts. How well he performed his duty there are hundreds of men in all parts of the country who will be glad to testify. He was present at every meeting, and by his courteous ushering of homeless and friendless men to comfortable seats, did his best to show how he appreciated the kindly welcome he received in the day of his extremity; then in a ringing, resonant voice he would give his testimony to the saving power of Christ.

Recently he secured an appointment out West, where he is now at work. In his letters to the Mission he never fails to declare his steadfast faith in Christ, and his unwavering determination to be true to the teachings and inspiration he received here. "There has not been an hour since my departure," he wrote recently, "that I have not had you and the Mission on my mind. I want the boys to pray for me. I never was so happy in my life. I owe it all to the grand influence of the Bowery Mission."

The preacher has been lamenting ever since that it was impossible for him to accept that royal urgency.

That youth came back from the Philippines at the expiration of the Spanish-American War with the rank of captain in the army. The family removed to the vicinity of one of our great universities for the education of the younger son and the daughters. That son is now the graduated Registrar of the University. The accomplished daughters are settled near their mother. The father has gone to his eternal rest, after a useful, happy and honored life.

So resulted that happy marriage, solemnized within thirteen hours of a first interview; and that launching out in a sublime heroism, with faith and love for life and work and high success in the then far-off West.

Roosevelt's Terse Sayings

N the course of his Western trip ex-President Roosevelt has met ny kinds of audiences and discussed wide variety of topics. Whether hearers agreed with him or not itically, they were always impssed with his plain, outspoken adss and his sturdy hatred of everyng in the form of sham, corruption l dishonesty in the public service. ne of his most characteristic utteres are given below:

I don't suppose I shall ever be in olic life again, but if I am there is ays a chance that some time it ny come up when I shall make my rds good. . . . No corporath, no politician, must ever support n for anything under the idea that

If eer corporation or politician, if eer one or the other, helps to put mn a position of influence, let them remember that if they are corrupt, if th encourage corruption in others onefit by it themselves, they help mat their peril, for I will hurt them if get the chance."—At Freeport, Ill.

Public honesty is a sham if we lirt the word honesty to mere law hosty. There are big men whom I cot as the worst enemies against th real welfare of the public, alhigh these men have been so well ac sed as not to be convicted. There ar some of them in New York.

am a good party man, but I'm arAmerican first.

Among those who manage our gernment, State and national, in leslative and judicial positions, we reard the one vital and essential matte to be honesty. The crook in pulic life is the gravest menace to ou political institutions, and we call onall good citizens to drive him out of ublic life.

eadership must not only be brave ar honest, but it must be sober and mit accord with the dictates of comon sense. Exactly as the conse ative who favors abuses and conni s at corruption is in reality the wst enemy of conservatism, so the popular leader or reformer who acts in he spirit of the demagogue, or of th wild-eyed visionary who incites toxcess and to rash action and stirs upass hatred, is himself the worst fo of progress, the most dangerous enny of the popular cause which he presses to champion.

The great captains of industry do wo, and are entitled to great rethat they have not obtained their offices honestly, but have obtained their offices dishonestly and by corruption, who they know have practiced corruption in public life, they may make up their minds that they will get the government to which they are entitled, and a bad government it will be."—At Chicago, Ill.

"The new nationalism puts the national need before sectional or personal advantage. It is impatient of the utter confusion that results from local legislatures attempting to treat national issues as local issues. It is still more impatient of the impotence which springs from the over-division of government powers, the impotence which makes it possible for local selfishness or for legal cunning, hired by wealthy special interests, to bring national activities to a deadlock. This new nationalism regards the executive power as the steward of the public welfare. It demands of the judiciary that it shall be interested primarily in human welfare rather than in property, just as it demands that the representative body shall represent all the people rather than any one class or section of the people."—At Osawatomie, Kan.

Moisture Will Spoil Ordinary Soda Crackers

NO matter how good the ingredients or how careful the baking, once expose soda crackers to the slightest dampness of air and they lose their taste and much of their food value.

That's why bulk crackers kept in barrels, boxes and cans get tasteless and tough and hard to swallow. They absorb moisture, and they also gather dust, germs and store odors. What a pity that this most nutritious of flour foods is so contaminated!

But there is a soda cracker too good, too perfect to be thus treated! After baking, Uneeda Biscuit are immediately placed in dust tight, moisture proof packages which preserve their crispness, flavor and nourishment.

Let me send you one of my beautiful silk petticoats

—Mrs. Delworth

I WANT to show you how easy it is to get one of my high grade all-silk petticoats, exactly as shown in the picture. Notice the very high trimmed sectional flounces, the upper section, trimmed with two groups, each consisting of four dainty air tucks; lower sections joined with fashionable bands; all tailor made and beautifully proportioned, with full flare at bottom of about four yards. Full depth underlay and dust ruffle of good quality cotton.

The silk in this petticoat is very heavy and strongly woven, a fine, rich, lustrous black. In fact, if you bought the silk alone at your local store, it would cost more than I am asking for the completed skirt. I give you all the middleman's profits, and by selling direct from mill to wearer, give you the most astonishing petticoat value you ever heard of. You also get, with each skirt, my absolute guarantee of satisfaction or money back, and buy for less than the actual retail price of the material.

Samples FREE This petticoat is sold at such a low price that I cannot afford the large investment that would be necessary if I made it in a variety of colors, and hence I offer it in black only, but I will gladly send free samples of the silk used in making it, together with sample card of colors and petticoats of other styles. You will be delighted, I know, with the catalogue, and I urge you to send for it to-day, even though you may not be quite ready to buy a petticoat. I want every woman to know how easy it is to get her petticoats, both black and colors, at a lower price than even her store has to pay.

This Handsome $5 Petticoat, $3.75

A Perfect Fit Guaranteed

Give me the length desired (from 36 to 44) and I will guarantee a perfect fit or the skirt may be returned at my expense and I will refund every cent paid. The petticoat shown in the picture is my Fall leader, latest style, fashionable cut. At $5.00 I know you would say it was extra good value, but for a time I will send it to any reader of this magazine for only $3.75. Send your express or post office address, with money order for $3.75, and I will send you the best petticoat value in the world.

Accept My Liberal Offer

This liberal bargain is offered to increase my list of customers and to show the saving that is made by my new plan of selling petticoats direct from "mill to wearer."

One Customer Writes: "I have just received the beautiful silk petticoat and I am delighted with it. I will take pleasure in showing it to my friends and will try to induce them all to patronize you. It will be to their advantage to do so. Thanking you for the splendid quality of garment and your promptness in sending it," etc.

Write me personally to-day and get this beautiful silk petticoat by return express. You run no risk, as my guarantee is absolute—money back if not satisfactory. The publishers of this magazine would not accept this advertisement if they were not fully assured of my responsibility.

Doctors Against Alcohol

By L. D. MASON, M.D.

THE decision of all medical experts at home or abroad, meaning thereby such as have especially made a study of the effects of alcohol on the human body in health or disease, is that alcohol is a poison in any form, in any quantity, at any time, under any condition, in health or disease, either as a beverage or as a medicine. This view practically eliminates alcohol in any relation to the human economy. Sir Victor Horsley, F.R.C.S., the celebrated neurologist and surgeon of London, England, sums up the whole situation in a few words: "One conclusion emerges from the recent investigation of the whole alcohol question, namely, that it is quite impossible to state that any given minimum amount of the drug is harmless to our tissues," and we may add, this statement holds good either in health or disease.

Alcohol is a protoplasmic poison. "The organism is not an individual but a social mechanism, always bringing us at last to cells."—Virchow.

The most remarkable evidence of the increasing disuse of alcohol in disease is found in the "records of supplies" in the London Metropolitan Hospitals. In the comparative consumption of spirits, wines and malt liquors in a period of fifty years the liquor bill is three times less and the milk bill three times more. There has been a steady decrease and increase in these particulars and it is more marked every year along the lines of economy and medical practice. In Europe and this country there are special hospitals known as "temperance hospitals" in which alcohol is not used at all. In the London County Asylum the comparative consumption and decrease in the use of spirits, wine and beer is remarkable in a period dating from 1889 to 1905 and 1906. In 1889 the amount of spirits and wine consumed was 1,902 gallons; in 1905 and 1906, 205 gallons. Beer consumed in 1899, 255,486½ gallons; in 1905 and 1906, 1,281½ gallons. From these facts there can be no doubt as a universal, world-wide fact that the hospitals of the world (for the fact applies in a measure to all civilized countries) are eliminating alcohol as a remedy in medical practice; and hospital practice regulates as a rule, and determines general medical practice.

The effects of alcohol on the intellectual faculties and higher brain are best shown in the words of Dr. Clouston, the celebrated neurologist and mental specialist of London, England: "From the medical and scientific point of view we have this great physiological fact before us—that the first thing that alcohol does in 99 cases out of 100 is to affect the mental working of the brain of the man who imbibes."

The lunacy statistics of England and Wales as shown in the sixty-third report of the commissioners contains among other interesting and important facts the following statement: "Taking a survey of the last fifty years it is seen that lunacy has increased from 36,762 cases in 1859 to 128,787 cases on January 1, 1909, an increase of 92,025. This is not merely an actual increase keeping pace with the increase of population. It is a vast proportionate increase, for whilst population has increased by 81.5 per cent., lunacy has increased 250 per cent." Dr. Clouston in the report of Morningside Asylum as early as 1903 says: "Alcoholic insanity steadily goes up and now it has doubled." All neurologists in this country and in Europe agree that all nervous diseases and insanity are at the present time largely on the increase and the use of alcohol is a prominent basic factor in this increase, to say nothing of other forms of disease not specifically affecting the nervous system.

Whether we consider alcohol as a drug to be used in medicine or as a beverage in daily life, we can only say of it after a consideration of the gh-est scientific and medical expert sti-mony in all centres of civilization hat it has no place in the human eco my as a drug or beverage in disea or health; that its action "is evil and nly evil and that continually." One has nly to read the proceedings of the Amer-ican Society for the Study of Al hol and Other Narcotics, the Amer-can Journal of Inebriety and the num ous articles in the American medical ess as well as the papers read in the ari-ous medical societies and the ive interest taken by many prom ent American practitioners, to know the attitude of medicine in Americ to-wards alcohol as a drug. The ame holds true of special journalis in Great Britain and on the Contine, as represented in the British Journ of Inebriety and the large influenti so-ciety of medical men it represents and the general attitude of the influ tial medical public to the cause, and ac-tice of medical or scientific tempe nce, so-called, and a growing conserv ism in the use of alcohol in disease, a its gradual elimination from medical ac-tice.

To present a proper consensus the opinions and practice of medic ex-perts in Europe or this country an-not be compassed in an article o reasonable length, or that would r be wearisome to the average non-p fessional reader. No student or te her of the effects of alcohol upon the dy, mind or morals can be grossly no-rant on these points nor of the tion of any other narcotic or habit-p luc-ing drug. Information on thes sub-jects is too abundant and is r dily accessible at the present time. It can-not be said as of old: "My p ople perish for lack of knowledge," as the intelligent classes; if so, modern conditions and opportuni s, is because they wilfully blind he eyes to the truth, and to the abu dant sources of information so ofte ar gratuitously placed before them. The medical profession from its h hest ranks and most noted and inte ent members in Europe and this co t for many years past has given it ime to instructing the people of all ci ized communities and calling their ten tion to the physical, mental, ral degenerating effects of alcohol, a thi time has come, and now is, wh no seeker after the truth from a sci tific standpoint need be misinformed, not informed at all. If any in th en lightened age fail in these pa icu lars, it will be because they a te indifferent, or too incapable, to va themselves of the sources of inf ma tion so freely extended to the o every side.

"Ten Thousand Boys in Blue"

WITH their war-torn banners streaming in the breeze, and wi the bugles and drums sounding th same inspiring notes that cheered tln in victory and defeat for fc years, the veterans of the Grand Ary of the Republic marched up the bord walk of Atlantic City on Septeber 22. There were ten thousand ofhem, and with few exceptions they ccered the three miles of the parade ar were surprisingly fresh at the finh. There was not a single serious acdent, such as has saddened previns encampments, and only a few reaired medical attention. The wther was ideal for the encampment ar the veterans braced up under the sc air and stepped off briskly with th cheers of 100,000 spectators.

ommander-in-Chief Van Sant led th battle-scared line, the famous U. S. Gnt Post of New York acting as his escrt. Then came a division of musians of the Civil War, who played th old tunes as if they had not been ary out of practice. Pennsylvania ha a big delegation in the line and th "Bucktails" of the Keystone State were wildly applauded when their flags were seen approaching the grandstand, flags which in some cases were mere shreds of silk upon their poles.

New York's delegation wore white trousers and natty white caps; New Jersey, as was natural, had a big delegation in the parade, as the encampment was right at home for them. Sixteen Jersey posts paraded.

On the reviewing stand were Vice-President Sherman, Lieutenant-General Nelson A. Miles, Governor Stuart of Pennsylvania, Governor Fort of New Jersey, Admiral Melville and many others famous in war or statesmanship. It took four hours for the parade to pass the reviewing officers. There has been much talk lately about the stress and strain on the veterans of the Encampment parade as there have been in past years a number of fatal prostrations. The last parade has proved there is a good deal of strength left in the nation's heroes yet, and that under favorable conditions, with good weather, they can make a good showing when the old familiar call comes ringing from the bugles and the sergeants call, "Fall in!"

Ashamed of Illinois

Im ashamed to think that grand old Illinoi would be the first to rule the Bible out of our schools. It looks like heathenism to me. Th Bible is the foundation of everything that is gd. A Reversion to Paganism

Ts saddest piece of news recorded lately by TH CHRISTIAN HERALD is the statement of the Bit being closed to the schools of Illinois by the rder of the Supreme Court. We may suppos that two-thirds of those in the schools have no Bible in their homes. What would be the result? Paganism, anarchy. Other nations would see the need of sending missionaries to teach us Christianity. Let all Christian people make it a solemn matter of prayer that our Master and Lord be not ignored.

Dear Christian Herald: Thou queen of all papers, thou art an instrument in God's hand to lighten burdens and make crooked paths straight! How thankful we should all feel that you have taken up the question of the Bible in the public schools. Words cannot express my heartfelt gratitude to you in so great a matter. Let every Christian cry aloud: "Give us the Bible for our children!" May God show Illinois just what slippery ground she stands on. All the United States are looking on to see the outcome. MRS. W. W. A School Teacher and the Bible

I read every word of your editorial, "Ruling Out the Bible." I taught school in the rural districts of Illinois for a number of years during the seventies—1874 to 1879. My schools were always opened by singing of a Gospel hymn, repeating the Lord's Prayer in concert and reading a chapter of the Bible. Eternity alone can reveal the good that may have been accomplished by this simple service. I regret very much to know that the Bible has been ruled out of the public schools of the State of Illinois. J. E. HARDY.

BISHOPRIC WALL BOARD AND SHEATHING

Bishopric Wall Board is cheaper and better than Lath and Plaster; also saves time in building.

This practical substitute for lath and plaster is easily nailed to studding. Being applied dry, it is at once ready for paint, paper or burlap. Saves time and labor; is clean and sanitary; guaranteed

Proof Against Dampness, Heat, Cold, Sound, Vermin

Bishopric Wall Board is made of kiln-dried dressed lath, IMBEDDED in hot Asphalt Mastic, and surfaced with sized cardboard; is cut at the factory into uniform sheets 4x4 ft. sq. and three-eighths of an inch thick. These sheets (delivered in crates) are easily and quickly nailed to studding ready for wall paper, paint or burlap.

ITS MANY USES: — Bishopric Wall Board is used for dwellings, pleasure, health resort and factory buildings, new partitions in old buildings, finishing attics, cellars, porches, laundries, garages.

Price $2.50 per 100 sq. ft. or $6.40 per crate of 256 sq. ft. f. o. b. factories, New Orleans, Cincinnati, or Alma, Mich.

Bishopric Sheathing saves 75 per cent. in material and labor. Ideal for frame or cement buildings.

Bishopric Sheathing is both better and cheaper than lumber. It is the same material as Wall Board, but finish is not necessarily so fine; therefore costs less. Quickly nailed to studs with laths and asphalt exposed, forming dead air space between laths and weather boards. Makes smoother and more solid job than lumber; no holes, no shrinking. Proof against heat, cold and dampness.

For Cement or Stucco Work

Bishopric Sheathing has no equal in economy and satisfactory results. Space between laths forms excellent key for cement. Moisture cannot penetrate asphalt body of Sheathing. Our FREE booklet explains everything.

Bishopric Sheathing also is used with excellent results as cheapest and best lining for dairy barns, poultry houses, stables and all other outdoor buildings.

Price $2 per square of 100 sq. ft. or $5.12 per crate of 256 sq. ft. f. o. b. New Orleans, Cincinnati, or Alma, Mich.

Preacher to Americans

MANY Americans spend Sundays in Paris unaware of the warm welcome and strong, uplifting service that awaits those who find their way to the undenominational service held in the American Chapel. This chapel has been for years an evangelical landmark, having been made so by such able and devoted pastors as Drs. Kirk, Seeley, Prentiss, McClintock, Sunderland and Robinson, the hymn compiler. Add to these the names of Drs. Beard and Thurber, and you have a notable galaxy of Gospel preachers who have made the well appointed chapel a centre of Christian faith, light and life.

home as though you were in a New England church, so closely do service and sermon resemble those of the home churches. The Rev. Chauncey W. Goodrich of Ohio is the present pastor. For six years he has carried on the work skilfully and acceptably. His twenty-minute sermons, like those of Dr. Babcock, are full of concentrated thought and spiritual insight. He lays claim to all American Paris as his parish, and glories in its size, for on a summer Sunday, from 40,000 to 50,000 are in Paris "from the States," and the large auditorium is usually well filled. Dr. Goodrich marries, baptizes and officiates at the funerals of many who dwell in hotels and pensions.

Pastor Goodrich says he wishes to become acquainted with all Americans in Paris who come to his church. He asks that they should linger and introduce themselves at the close of the service, or send him their names and address. The American Chapel is supported by the gifts of its people and their friends. One feature of the work of the American Chapel which commends it to many, is that it has a beautiful mortuary chamber, where the remains of Americans who die in Paris can be kept (in a low temperature) until arrangements are made to send the bodies to their relatives in the United States. Sympathy from Far Labrador

WITH deep regret we hear that Dr. Klopsch passed away in March and is no longer among us. For many years past he has been a true friend of the Moravian Missions in general and the Labrador work in particular, and it is needless to say that his kindness and goodwill have always been much appreciated. We keenly realize that we have lost in him a sincere friend and benefactor.

WHICH SHALL IT BE?*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

AFTER Jesus had spoken the parables about the ten virgins and the talents, teaching the duty of atchfulness and faithful stewardship, e gave a discourse, which was in fact prophecy concerning the last judgent which should come to all people.

The Judgment Day

Many people think of it only as a y of wrath, and so are in dread of it ll their liives. Even some very good eople feel this way about it. And as r sinners, indeed, it has always been decided check to their evil deeds; ear making them halt in their wrong oing when nothing else could. What picture Jesus gave of the day! he imself seated on the throne of his lory, and all nations of those who ad ever lived upon the earth, both the ood and the evil, gathered about him. Ve wonder that a mortal man should ven try to paint a picture of such a ene; but Michael Angelo did in a resco which covers the end wall of the ixtine Chapel of the Vatican, the alace of the Pope. He was sixty ears old when he began painting it. Ie spent seven years upon the work, ompleting it in 1541. It is considered ne of the greatest pictures in the orld. Leading up to it on either side re majestic figures of the prophets. Jesus said: "He shall set the sheep n the right hand, but the goats on the eft." In saying this he put himself n the place of a shepherd he had no oubt seen leading forth a flock of hite sheep and black goats, which fter leading into a valley he proeeded to divide, tapping each sheep on ne right side of the head, showing in hich direction it should go, and tapng each goat on the left side, indiating where it should go.

But why should Jesus take sheep as ymbols of good people, and goats of vil people? We all know how clean nd tractable and lovable sheep are, hile goats are quite the contrary, beng stubborn and foul smelling. There re certainly not these physical differnces between good and evil people, ut there is a marked difference in ersonality. "I find it lots nicer to be ssociated with these people than I did ith gamblers," said a man who had or twenty-two years been himself a ambler and then had enlisted as a hristian reformer.

The Prophecy of Jesus

In his prophecy Jesus went on to ell how those who were like sheep hould receive commendation for the ood works they had done, and how hose like the goats should receive conemnation for their evil deeds. The goats" had not only done those things hich they ought not to have done, but ney had left undone those things hich they ought to have done. The sheep," on the other hand, had done ind and gracious things in the name f Jesus for the poor and the sick, and hose in need of friendly aid: "I was ungry and ye gave me to eat; I was hirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was stranger and ye took me in; naked, nd ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye isited me; I was in prison, and ye ame unto me." Thus we see sweet hristian charity divided into its parts, s we may see a ray of light divided nto beautiful colors by aid of a prism. hose whom Jesus placed on his right and were surprised to have their ood deeds spoken of by him. They ad done them almost unwittingly, ecause the love of Christ had contrained them.

Those on the left were equally surrised by being told that they had done one of these things. Because the love of Christ was not in them, they had not been moved to be kind and sympathetic. Jesus did not mean to teach salvation by works, but rather what should be the attitude of man toward his God, which should be so loving that it would show itself in good deeds done to others in his name, because man can not bestow benefits upon God. We are to be judged then according to whether or not the love of Christ is in us, by which we are impelled to do good works. There can be no love without good works, and there can be no good works without love.

"There is therefore no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." (Rom. 8: 1.)

Christians Have Nothing to Fear

How often we have heard Mr. D. L. Moody quote this passage of Scripture to prove that there is nothing in the judgment for the Christian to fear! "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us." How far is the east from the west? So far that they never can possibly be brought together! How can it be then but that the day of judgment will be a day of rejoicing among those who have taken Christ for their Saviour? Only those need to fear the judgment who have all their lives rejected Christ as their Saviour.

A woman who all her life had stood in terror of the judgment, heard Mr. Moody preach from the text, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus," and her fears fell from her like shackles, and she became a happy Christian, whereas before she had found but little joy in her religion.

Dr. Guthrie, the eminent Scotch preacher, said: "It were no kindness to spread a covering over the pit. That is the cunning hunter's business, and the business of him who hunts the world for souls. It is an awful thought, that pit; it is an awful reality, that pit; it is an awful abode, that pit; and this is an awful declaration, 'The wicked shall be cast into hell, and all the nations that fear not God.' But even against these stern declarations, and between the pit and God, a high red cross is standing. Mercy descends from heaven, lights upon its summit, and preaches hope to despair, pardon to guilt, salvation to the lost. Free as the winds that fan her cheek, free as the sunbeams that shine on her golden tresses, she invites all to come, opens her arms to embrace the world, and in a voice that sounds like a silver trumpet, cries, 'O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord.'" Some one has said: "We can only see sin in its hideousness when we realize that the measure of its mischief is the cross."

Letting in the Light

Some time ago we read a beautiful allegory of a little girl who went into a dark room. "I must let in the light," she said, and so she opened the window shutter part way. She saw that everything in the room was dusty. Then she opened the shutter farther and began to dust off the chairs. But still more light was needed, for there were dark corners, and she knew they must be full of dust, so she opened the shutters wide. Then she saw so much dust, she said: "Oh, I shall never be able to get the room clean." But her despair did not last, and she began to work in earnest, and before she left the room, everything was bright and shining and clean. Here is the meaning of the allegory: The dark and dusty room was her own heart. Her Sunday School teacher suggested that she should look into it, and then she began to realize that she was sinful. The more and more she looked into her

FAMOUS Holeproof Hosiery FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

All the newest colors now on show

Our yarn costs an average of 70c per lb. We could use 30c yarn, but the hose wouldn't be soft and attractive like "Holeproof." We spend $33,000 a year merely for inspection. So every pair is right. Six pairs of men's "Holeproof" guaranteed for six months cost $1.50. The light weight mercerized cost $2. The lustre sox—finished like silk—cost $3. One color or the newest colors assorted. We sterilize each pair twice in the making, so the colors are fast — the hose sanitary. We don't know where else you can get hose like these, though you pay twice what we ask for "Holeproof." They are made for women and children, too. Six pairs of women's hose cost $2 (mercerized $3). The children's hose cost $2 for six pairs.

Sold in Your Town The genuine "Holeproof" is sold in your town. We'll tell you the dealers' names on request or ship direct where we have no dealers, charges prepaid on receipt of price.

Sunday School Lesson

heart, the more sinful she saw herself to be. And then she began to wish that she might be "clean inside," then by repentance and prayer and accepting Jesus as her Saviour her heart was made pure and bright. What a change her friends saw in her! There is a verse in the Bible which says: "Even a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure, and whether it be right." (Prov. 20: 11.)

A child who loves the Saviour will be filled with good works, and at last will be commended by the Lord himself. When Duke William of Normandy was departing to the Holy Land, he called together the peers and required them to swear allegiance to his young son, who was a mere infant. When the barons smiled at the feeble babe, the king promptly replied to their smile: "He may be little now, but he will grow." And he did grow, and ruled that nation with a rod of iron. And the Christian child will grow in all-conquering love and service. We must believe that at the last great day, thousands upon thousands of children will be found at the right hand of Jesus Christ.

Perhaps there will be some children on the left hand. There will be none there if the home and the Sunday School do their duty. Undoubtedly there are some wicked children, but it is not characteristic of children to reject the Saviour. There is an Eastern story of Hassan Abu, a diamond merchant of Bagdad, famed for his great tenderness of heart, that one day returning home with a pouch of newly purchased precious stones upon his saddle, he heard the voice of a child calling as if in distress. Turning in his saddle, he saw a lame-footed boy some short distance off. "Could you carry a poor boy who is footsore, and who has a burden?" pleaded the seeming beggar. Hassan's heart was touched at once. The boy was set upon the horse to ride behind Hassan. But soon after, to Hassan's terror, he found both boy and diamonds gone. Not far from the spot was a large stone. Hassan got down from his horse and sat down upon the stone to recover from the shock. For a long time he sat there, thinking over his loss. At length he said, "For one wicked lad, I will not turn against all the rest; no, I will go on loving children better than before." Whereupon an angel appeared to Hassan and rewarded him with still greater riches. Let those take this story to heart who labor in the Sunday School under discouraging circumstances to save the children. And this reminds us that October 16 is set apart by the World's Sunday School Association as a day of prayer for Sunday Schools throughout the world. For thirty-seven years this day has been observed in England, and surely we should have it in the United States, because of the total enrolment of the Sunday School as reported at the World's Convention last May, 27,888,479, the United States has 15,084,164.

The occasion makes the subject of this lesson most appropriate. It should bring about a general "Decision day" in all Sunday Schools everywhere. The day and the subject will also give opportunity for making plans to enable the children to help in the work of the Sunday School and the church, so that they may learn how to visit the sick, the poor, and the strangers, and so fulfil the law of Christ.

What Life Consists Of

Life consists in the abundance of things which we do rather than in the abundance of things which we have. Two men were sitting together one evening telling about their plans for the New Year which was close at hand. One of them spoke of a sentence he had seen on a mosque: "This world is merely a bridge. You are to pass over it and not to build upon it." "But what does it mean?" "A bridge is meant for crossing over to the other side. You may pause upon it and meditate, but you cannot dwell there. You must move on. That seems to me nonsense. I do not think we should scorn or neglect the world, and just live for another."

"Men in old days built on London bridge, and by that obstructed the traffic, and those who build on this world, and live as if they were to remain here, hinder others from passing over, and pressing on to what is beyond this life." "You mean, then, that life is not rightly looked at until you use it as a means to pass over to that life beyond?" "Yes, we must never forget that life is a bridge. We are not to settle down here, we are to see the land beyond, we are to hasten to the abiding city." "You are right. I have learned something I hope I shall never forget."

Could one desire a better epitaph than what the Bible says of Joshua? "He left nothing undone of all that the Lord commanded." Joshua will surely be one of those set on the right hand of Jesus in the great judgment day, and in the same company will be found faithful Abraham, and true Samuel, wise Deborah, noble Ruth, loving David, the wise prophets, the apostles of Jesus, including the myriad-minded Paul, the charitable Dorcas, the noble women who were with Jesus at the crucifixion and were the first to see him after his resurrection, the loving Nicodemus, who brought an hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes to place about the body of Jesus in preparation for his burial, the generous Joseph who gave his new tomb that Jesus might be placed therein. We shall see also on the right hand those of whom we have read so much: the noble army of martyrs. And the faithful fathers and mothers, the noble coworkers and fellow-helpers to the truth. How grand will be the judgment day!

Reduces Cost of Living

NOT long ago the writer was visiting a large mill, when the superintendent brought in the first specimen of a new garment. He said it had cost more than $3,000 to produce that one perfect garment, which he hoped eventually to sell for 50 cents.

What would it cost to make the goods for a single dress or suit of clothes? It would simply be impossible for you to secure these necessities as you can now, if advertising did not sell the quantity necessary to reduce the price.

You can improve the condition of life by doing your part, humble though it be, in developing our great advertising industries. Do not think it a trifling matter; there is more to it than you can possibly realize at first thought; that is our reason for giving you these weekly talks on the subject.

Remember that nothing you now enjoy would be quite so good or quite so cheap, were it not for some form of advertising—not even THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

fortification. The godi (the members of the parliament) came from all parts of Iceland, bringing tent cloth with them, of which they built small tabernacles or dwelling places. When the parliament was in session, the members were seated in three concentric circles with pieces of turf for benches. They came to Thingvellir annually, and the date of their assembling was from June 18 to 24. Then the result of their deliberations was proclaimed from the law mountain, a slight eminence overlooking the valley, by the speaker. The first year of the parliament was 930 A.D. But the rulers did not acknowledge the God of Nations, but rather they revered and worshiped Odin as the sire of beasts and men.

But a great change came. On June 24, 1000 A.D., Iceland passed from heathenism to Christianity under the leadership of Thorgeis, the then speaker of the parliament, and it is said to have been done without a murmur. From that time Christian churches began to be built in Iceland, and in the museum at Reykjavik one may see to-day many choice pieces of arts and crafts work which have been preserved from those ancient edifices. And from that time to this Iceland has been a land of religious people. There is the State Church, the Free Church (both Lutheran) and the Roman Catholic. Outside of Reykjavik and two or three of the larger towns, the pastors have widely extended parishes, covering about twenty-five miles square. Some of the people must ride six hours to get to the church service.

The pastors spend much of their time riding ponies, for they have a patriarchal charge over their people. They must instruct the children and prepare them for confirmation, and they must also examine them in reading, writing and "reckoning," following up the teaching by parents and work of the schoolmaster, who travels from house to house, generally spending two or three weeks in each place. The pastor has a large roll-book, in which he keeps all records of the people in his parish, their ages, their marriages, the births and deaths in their families. The longevity in Iceland is very great, frequently over ninety years of age. The pastor notes in his book whether or not the children read well, whether their writing is good or bad, and whether they are good at figures. There is a compulsory education law in Iceland for all children between ten and fourteen years of age, and it is so well enforced that there is no illiteracy.

Iceland is altogether a law-abiding place. There is only one jail, and that rarely ever has more than two people in it. This is to be largely accounted for by the fact that there is not a distillery nor a brewery in all Iceland. Some liquors are imported from Scotland, Norway and Denmark, but there will be an end to this in the year 1912, when the prohibitory law passed by Parliament on July 30, 1909, will go into effect. An acute legal gentleman of Scotland who has examined it says that "it is hard and fast at every point"—a well-made law. The Good Templars have taken a very active part in securing this law, and they are preparing the way for its enforcement. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union have also had influence in the matter. While in Reykjavik I was invited to address a meeting of Good Templars and tell them about prohibition in the United States. I also spoke to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Before going to Iceland, I was told that there were no Sunday Schools there. This quite decided me upon trying to inaugurate a Sunday School movement. Several meetings were held with this end in view. One of them was largely attended, and the decision was reached that Sunday Schools should be organized in the early fall. As the initiative was taken by a Sunday School lesson writer of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, it may fairly be called a CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School movement. The Iceland Sunday School Association will be affiliated with the World's Sunday School Association. Requests were at once made that a list of books on Sunday School teaching should be given them, that they might begin preparation for their work. Possibly CHRISTIAN HERALD readers might help in this matter.

It is probably known to many of our readers that Icelanders were the first discoverers of America. Very shortly after coming over from Norway, they pushed out across the sea and discovered Greenland; then they followed down the coast of Labrador until they reached a fruitful spot bearing grapes, which they called Vinland, probably the island of Nantucket or Cape Cod. But they did not follow up their discoveries by making settlements. If they had done so Columbus would not have been given the honor, nearly six hundred years later, of discovering America!

—MISSIONARY J. M. PERKINS of Cape Palmas, Liberia, writes telling of a journey into native villages in the interior, with magic lantern and Bible pictures. The natives were surprised and delighted.

—THE PRESBYTERIAN church of Dale County, Ala., was burned to the ground on August 23. It was built by the contributions of a small membership at great sacrifice. It was not insured, and its loss is a great blow to the little community. Miss Anne Keahey of Clio, Ala., is secretary of the church.

—AMONG THE LATEST gifts to our Children's Home during this season, was one of $3 sent by Mrs. Frank Whitney of Salisbury, Vt. This was the gift of her Sunday School class, to be devoted to giving one poor tenement child an outing. Senor Alto, a Cuban reader, sent $5 from that country for Mont-Lawn's fresh-air work.

—THE THIRD ANNUAL Bible Conference, held under the auspices of the Montrose (Pa.) Bible Conference Association, closed August 28, with record-breaking attendance of 3,600 people. One of the features of the conference was the awakening of a revival spirit, which resulted in many conversions. During the meetings stirring evangelistic appeals were made by Dr. A. C. Dixon, Mr. Melvin E. Trotter and Dr. Torrey. A number of the evening sessions were given over to evangelistic preaching. The presiding officer of the conference is Dr. R. A. Torrey, who was in charge of all the sessions, except those of Missionary Day, these being directed by Rev. Charles E. Hurlburt, of the African Inland Mission.

—IT IS ANNOUNCED that the Interior has effected a consolidation with the Westminster of Philadelphia. Dr. Richard Sill Holmes, the editor of the Westminster, will be editorially associated with the new journal. Among the regular contributors will be: Hon. J. A. Macdonald, of Toronto; Dr. John Timothy Stone, Dr. John Douglas Adam, Mary E. McDowell, Dr. Henry Van Dyke, Dr. C. H. Parkhurst, Dr. James Denney, Dr. Campbell Morgan, Dr. Charles W. Gordon, Sir Wilfred Grenfell, and others.

—PLANS ARE maturing for the World's Christian Citizenship Conference to be held in Philadelphia, November 16-20. Delegates are being appointed by Mission Boards and Societies, Church Courts higher and lower, Congregations, Young People's Societies, State and National Peace Societies, Women's Christian Temperance Unions and various other reform organizations, and specially the National Reform Association, which has undertaken the work of arranging for the Conference. The Conference is expected to adopt a declaration of the Christian principles of civil government. The programme will refer to such matters as public education, laws affecting the family, the day for rest and worship, righteous men for civil office, intemperance, the reformation of criminals, the abolition of war, the salvation of the cities, and a revival of national religion.

THE HOWARD WATCH

There will be no more Howards as low as $37.50, except the limited number now in the dealers' hands. The increasing demand for our better watches compels us to stop making this grade and concentrate on the finer movements.

On February 1st, of this year, we had to discontinue the $35.00 Howard as we announced at that time, and on June 15th we made the last of the $37.50 quality. These are both excellent watches.

The $35.00 watch sold out so fast that many people were disappointed. They didn't see the jeweler soon enough. It will be the same with the $37.50 if those who desire them do not act quickly.

See your jeweler at once, there will never be another Howard made at $37.50

This watch is 17-jewel single roller escapement, tested in its case at the factory—adjusted to three positions, temperature and isochronism—in hunting case only.

We wish it clearly understood that this is not a raise in price of Howard watches. It means that we have to increase our production of the finer watches and we can't do that by hurrying the work. In 65 years of watch making history a Howard has never been slighted.

Every year there are more men who want to own a Howard—never quite enough to go around.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached.

Not every jeweler can sell you a Howard watch. No jeweler can charge you more than the printed ticket calls for and the Howard is always worth that price.

Talk to the Howard jeweler in your town—he is a good man to know.

IN AFTER DAYS*

THE strong hold which the question of a future life has upon the modern mind is shown in many ways. One of the most significant is the large amount of literature constantly appearing on the subject.

In the book called In After Days several of our foremost thinkers advance interesting views upon immortality. Mr. Howells leads off with "A Counsel of Consolation," written in his gentlest vein.

"Religion will help, reason will help, love will help," he says, "but only time will bring relief. This will seem almost sacrilege, yet it is true, and the light of the common day is the very light of heaven. The wild, headlong passion for reunion with your dead will resolve itself into a patience in which they will always be present."

The truth of this saying will appeal to all the afflicted. Their lost beloved ones are at last fair visions ever beside them, but the wound feels no longer the intolerable smart of the first awful stroke.

"Time teaches. The recurring seasons lift. The daily routine sustains."

Mrs. Phelps-Ward regards "the preponderance of misery over happiness" in this world as a strong argument for immortality.

"There is no solution of this mystery except in some form of reimbursement to the suffering," she insists. "(This may not be theological, but it is logical.) Love is a serial story. It runs on past this life, 'to be continued' in our next. The Author of the greatest tale told in the universe is an Artist, and he will complete his work. This is our reasonable hope."

Mr. John Bigelow, now entering his tenth decade, speaks of the effect of sorrow in directing the minds of men to God and the thought of the great future, and adds:

"If any human testimony is credible, what is more credible than Paul's testimony of the appearance of Jesus to himself, and to his disciples after his crucifixion, and what better proof of a future life can be desired?"

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe bears unfaltering testimony to her belief in immortality. She speaks of her long and happy life, with its numerous vicissitudes, during which, she says:

"Visions have come and gone, but something has never left me. It still remains the foundation of my life, my light in darkness, my guide in uncertainty. Will this unchanging element die when I shall be laid in the earth? The visible world has no answer to this question, but a deep spring of life within me says, 'Look beyond. Thou mayst hope that all that made thy life divine will live for thine immortal part.'"

Henry M. Alden quotes the remark of the witty Tom Appleton, who, when told that he was about to die, exclaimed, "How interesting!"

We confront the great change, "not with a theory, but as our most interesting venture."

He reminds us of Isaiah's great phrase, describing mortal affliction as "a sword bathed in heaven"; and as death beckons us, "We see in swift vision the winged Psyche free of her Chrysalis."

Dr. William Hanna Thomson describes the universal inclusion, in all the great religions of the world, of a belief in a living hereafter; and contrasts the sensual heaven of the Moslem with the pure and lofty joy depicted as the employment of th Christian saint in Paradise.

"Now, at the end of the nineteent century," says Dr. Thomson, with justifiable note of triumph, "there ar at least five to one, compared with Vo taire's time, whose faith rests upo the Risen One."

Guglielmo Ferrero, the distinguishe Italian scholar, draws many illustr tions from the classics of the ancie thirst for and belief in immortality.

Henry James contributes the fin paper upon this fascinating subjec He appears to believe in immortalit but his well-known objection to pla expression makes his essay hard rea ing. This will be well understoo after perusing the following sentenc selected almost at random from amor many others equally obscure:

"The truth is that to live, to th tune, intellectually, and in order to beautiful things, with questions of b ing as such questions may for the ma of imagination aboundingly come u is to find one's view of one's share it, and above all of its appeal to shared, in an infinite variety, eno mously enlarged."

This must mean something, but can hardly repay the labor of findi out what that something is.

A charming verse by Austin Dobso introduces the volume, and beautiful defines the only claim an author shou have to the immortality of fame:

> In after days, when grasses high
> O'ertop the stone where I shall lie,
> Though ill or well the world adjust
> My slender claim to honored dust,
> I shall not question nor reply.
> I shall not see the morning sky;
> I shall not hear the night wind sigh:
> I shall be mute, as all men must
> In after days.
> But yet, now living, fain were I
> That some one then should testify,
> Saying, "He held his pen in trust
> To art, not serving shame or lust."
> Will none?—Then let my memory die
> In after days.

 In After Days.* By W. D. Howells, Henry James, John Bigelow, T. W. Higginson, H. M. Alden, W. H. Thomson, G. Ferrero, Julia Ward Howe and E. S. Phelps. With portraits. Harper & Brothers, New York. $1.25.

Young People's Societies

he Missionary Uprising*

EVER before in the history of the world has the missionary cause emed so hopeful as now. One rea- n for this is the ardent enlistment of e young people in its service. The me was when young people were not couraged to go forward in the great rld movements. In the old days, ey were repressed and kept down.

We have learned better now. We ow that in the youth of our land ride the force and fire, the unselfish- ss and the idealism, which are most eded in the spreading of our faith. e mighty Student Volunteer Move- nt is one proof of its efficiency.

The fact that young as well as old e laborers together with God; that ng as well as old are "God's hus- dry, God's building"; was never re prominently demonstrated than i the great gathering at Rochester lt January.

One testimony was there given, of i measurable value, to the importance c the daily, unhurried practice of ble study and prayer. Some of the rver sects attribute (and rightly) tir large success primarily to such s'dy and devotion. We must get o spiritual strength by feeding in t pasture of the Lord, as truly as we rst get our physical strength by ptaking of a nourishing diet. Espe- cly is this true of those who under- te the difficult task of carrying the Gpel to the heathen.

magine that you are dealing with nthern Africa, where less than ten p cent. of the inhabitants can read al write; where plural marriages a permitted, and any woman may be dorced at the whim of her husband; were missionaries testify that chil- dn grow up in the densest atmosphere o sin and are early taught the worst ves.

The accounts given of the work a ng these African Moslems, to the nmber of, perhaps, 60,000,000, were nt stimulating, though it was esti- med that probably more than half of tse had never been touched by mis- sinary influences, and that helpers we urgently needed. Nothing can nve the laborers there to their hard tk except long and deep study and pyer.

Given the reports at Rochester from th discouraging field of South Amer- icwere full of hope. In spite of the a ful immorality and consequent dis- reject of religion, the facts that mis- sinaries are now permitted by law in ery South American State except Pu; that the success of missionary wk has been great, especially in Aentina; and that the Young Men's Cistian Associations are meeting wn a warm reception there, show that prress is being made in this difficult fid. But again, it is only through st nuous waiting upon God.

Perhaps the testimonies from China we the most interesting and inspir- in of all that were given at Rochester.

Think of a population estimated at 4 000,000, among whom, except as ot medical missionaries have recently introduced them, there is no adequate knwledge of dentistry, surgery, med- ice or hygiene; where the women's fe are still almost universally bound; were the great "baby-towers" are st full of the bodies of tiny girls, w have been brutally given over to de h; and where in great cities there is ften no physician!

"Pray for missions," pleaded Miss Olorn of Foochow, "and pray that yo own heart may be made sensitive to hrist's voice and that you may be obdient to the vision."

opic of the Epworth League for Sunday, Oc ber 16. TEXT: I. Cor. 3: 9.

Your Amusements*

THIS subject, perhaps, comes nearest, of all those that have been discussed this year, to the hearts and consciences of us all.

It sometimes seems as though the world, especially the world of youth, were wild over amusements.

They hurry through their work in order that they may get to the ball-game or to their boating or tennis. They waste their time and strength and money at evening balls and theatres. They talk chiefly of their pleasures. Serious conversation, it is said, is becoming one of the rarest things in the world, especially among the young.

This is partly, in America at least, the result of a great reaction.

Not many years ago we were told that we were working too hard—that we did not know how to use leisure—that we must learn to play.

The American type is nothing if not ardent and enthusiastic. We cannot do anything moderately. From working too constantly and hard, there is reason to fear that we have gone to the other extreme.

One good feature of our frenzy, however, is the tendency visible everywhere toward out-door sports. They are far more wholesome than most of the indoor amusements.

The greatest questions of the hour, as the out-door season begins to shut us in, are, for most of our young people, "Shall we dance? Shall we play cards? Shall we go to the theatre?"

A young man who was brought up in a church-going family, which yet allowed dancing, has recently borne strong testimony against it.

He learned to dance as a child; took lessons again while in college; has been an industrious dancer ever since, and always "among the best people."

"But," said he, the other day, "I don't think it is right. It enkindles feelings that lead one to do wrong. I know that young men often go astray, who never would have wandered from the straight path but for their dancing."

My friends, can you not devise some interesting amusement to take the place of dancing? There are so many of you young people who are bright and inventive that it seems as though you might think of something equally fascinating to give an evening's diversion.

Of course, the late hours are a strong objection not only to dancing, but to card-parties and to the theatre. The girls who attend them can usually sleep late the next morning. The young men can seldom do this.

Many young men, even those who have not scruples against these forms of amusement, refrain from them simply because they find their business efficiency impaired by the late hours.

Cardplaying, even after the best plea has been made for it, leads to so many complications that it is a dubious pastime in many ways. Of course, it is far worse than dubious when stakes are placed, or the company is of a vulgar character.

There are many signs that the theatre is in process of reform. Some of the most popular modern plays have been more like sermons than like ordinary dramas. But here, as in every other form of amusement, comes in especially the great question of example, as set forth in the eighth chapter of I. Corinthians. The weak brother sees you at the good play. He says, "X goes to the theatre. Then it can't be wrong for me."

Thus he may feel himself justified in going to a doubtful play. Discriminate and pray regarding your amusements more earnestly than concerning anything else. It is they which may make or mar your Christian character.

A Humble Heroine

WHILE there are many heroines whose lives have been exploited by public recognition, there are also many whose fame is unsung. To this latter group belongs Mary A. Warren, who was born in Sumner, Me., of humble parents. Mary was the oldest of a family of nine children. As a young girl she had to work hard at household tasks. She loved books and made them her constant companions when her duties would permit. Especially did she love her Bible, and she was trained early in religious work. She united with the Baptist Church at the age of thirteen. Her parents being poor, she had no educational advantages.

She left home at the age of fifteen to earn means to further the education of her younger brothers. She began service as a common servant at a dollar and a half per week. Helpfulness and willingness to do small things made her friends wherever she went. While caring for an aged invalid she attracted the attention of the attending physician, who called her to the city, to be trained for special nursing. Soon her services were in great demand. Her salary reached as high as sixty dollars per month, her work taking her into some of the leading families of Boston.

Year after year, she worked and saved, her sole object in life being to help others. By saving and industry she accumulated means which enabled her to do many deeds of charity. She helped to educate her younger brothers, nieces and nephews. From the time she began to nurse she was the main support of her family.

She never married, preferring to devote her life to deeds of charity and kindness. For several years she trained the inmates of Boydton Institute, Va., in hygiene. For many years she gave a regular sum annually for the education of colored students as Christian workers. It was a matter of great satisfaction to her to look back and see the students she had supported and to learn of the work they were doing. She supported a native missionary in India, calling him "her substitute" who preached the Gospel while she slept. She founded two missionary schools, one in Jackson, Ala., in memory of her sister, Lydia A. Fuller, and one in Midway, Tenn., in memory of her father; the latter school known as the Nelson Warren Memorial.

This noble Christian woman passed away at the age of eighty-two. She left an estate of some $23,000, which was divided as follows:

To the American Baptist Missionary Union, $2,500; to the Woman's Home Mission Society, $2,500; in trust for the support of her native missionary in Ongole, India, $750; to the Boydton Institute, Va., $750; to the trustees of the Consumptive Home in Boston, established by Charles Cullis, $250.

Miss Warren was a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years, and sent it to a great many of her relatives, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bibles, encyclopedias, and other gift books.

A FOOD DRINK

Which Brings Daily Enjoyment

A lady doctor writes:

"Though busy hourly with my own affairs, I will not deny myself the pleasure of taking a few minutes to tell of my enjoyment daily obtained from my morning cup of Postum. It is a food beverage, not a poison like coffee.

"I began to use Postum eight years ago, not because I wanted to, but because coffee, which I dearly loved, made my mights long, weary periods to be dreaded and unfitting me for business during the day.

"On the advice of a friend, I first tried Postum, making it carefully as directed on the package. As I had always used 'cream and no sugar,' I mixed my Postum so. It looked good, was clear and fragrant, and it was a pleasure to see the cream color it as my Kentucky friend always wanted her coffee to look—'like a new saddle.'"

"Then I tasted it critically, for I had tried many 'substitutes' for coffee. I was pleased, yes, satisfied, with my Postum in taste and effect, and am yet, being a constant user of it all these years.

"I continually assure my friends and acquaintances that they will like it in place of coffee, and receive benefit from its use. I have gained weight, can sleep sound and am not nervous." "There's a reason."

A Great Woman Gone

ONE of the greatest women that this country has ever seen died in July in the town of Oberlin, O. It was her wish that nothing of "pomp or circumstance" should attend her funeral. It was therefore most quietly celebrated, and throughout this whole broad land there was little to indicate that a leader among us was passing.

Mrs. Adelia A. Field Johnston was born in Lafayette, O., in 1837. She was graduated from Oberlin College in 1856. After teaching a few years, she married Mr. James M. Johnston. Three years later he died, and in 1870 she was elected principal of the Woman's Department of Oberlin College.

In 1890 she was appointed professor of mediæval history there. She resigned her deanship in 1900, but did not give up her professorship until 1907, when her failing health compelled her to lay aside all outside work.

Mrs. Johnston was given the degree of M.A. by both Hillsdale and Oberlin Colleges. Western Reserve University made her an LL.D. in 1906.

During her thirty-three years of able and devoted service at Oberlin College, and her several years of teaching in other institutions, she touched scores of thousands of lives, and never one which was not made broader and better by the contact. Who can measure the influence which she shed around her, as a Christian, a scholar and a noble, public spirited and patriotic woman? It cannot be estimated.

Dr. H. M. Tenney, her pastor, called her in his funeral eulogy, "one of the world's greatest teachers."

The service which she rendered to Oberlin, as long president of its Village Improvement Society, was most efficient and enthusiastic. Says the editor of the Oberlin News: "She indelibly impressed her ideals upon the community," and "all Oberlin mourns her death."

It is given to few of her sex to move in so exalted a sphere as that which was given to this remarkable woman. Let us thank God for her long and useful life, and bless her memory for the glory which she shed upon womanhood.

A Strange Custom

JOHN FOSTER FRASER, the well-known traveler, describes a singular custom among the Afridis of northern India. He writes: "A year or two ago, the British troops went forth to punish the Zakha Khels, a tribe who inhabit the country of the Khyber Pass. That was because they trespassed into adjoining territory and stole the property of the neighboring tribes. In our eyes, they were nothing but a lot of common thieves, but in their own eyes thieving is an honorable calling. A young woman of the Zakha Khel will not look at a young man who would like to become her husband, unless he is proficient in the art. The dearest wish of a mother is that her little boy may become a cunning thief. . . . Every child is consecrated, as it were, at its birth to crime. A hole is made in the wall similar to that made by a burglar, and the mother passes the infant backwards and forwards through the hole, singing in its ear: 'Be a thief! Be a thief! Be a thief!'" They are probably the only tribe in India who glorify peculation and raise it to the dignity of a regular calling.

Costly Things

THE most costly book in the world is a Hebrew Bible, owned by the German Government, which a few years ago refused the Pope's offer of $125,000 for it. The most costly medicine a few years ago was metallic gallium, which sold for $150,000 a pound; but radium is now selling for more than that price an ounce. The highest price for a single flower was given for a tulip in Amsterdam by an enthusiast, who paid $250,000 for it.

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME.

A wonderful offer to every lover of music whether a beginner or an advanced player.

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number, if you desire) for either Organ, Violin, Piano, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing, Mandolin or Cello will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 11 year old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

Established 1898—have thousands of pupils from seven years of age to seventy.

Don't say you cannot learn music but send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7, 225 Fifth Ave., New York City.

Instruments supplied when needed. Cash or credit.

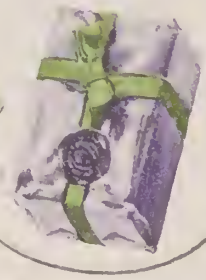
We Search the World for Ideas

There is no corner of the earth too far for us to send—if thereby we may gain some new ideas to better the Armour Toilet Products.

And in our great experimental laboratories, there is no time too long, no sum too great for us to spend—if thereby we may produce some new and rare essence for your use.

Though by the test of popular favor we lead the world in purity and quality, we are not satisfied, nor ever shall be.

It is this spirit, animating every member of our world-wide organization of experts, that has made possible a new standard of perfection in toilet articles, with Armour as the standard bearer.



Sylvan Soap

represents the perfection of modern toilet-soap production. It is scientifically prepared and chemically pure.

It cleanses perfectly, yet with so gentle a touch that the most tender skin is soothed. And it leaves the skin softened, vitalized—glowing with the bloom of health.

Delicate, distinctive perfumes lend to Sylvan the last touch of desirability. You may choose from six of these—heliotrope, carnation, violet, lilac, sandalwood and rose.

Yet, though the most dainty woman could demand no more, the price is but 10 cents the cake at your dealer's.

Supertar

has been aptly termed "The best friend of the hair."

For a Supertar shampoo stimulates, while thoroughly cleansing the scalp. It is a foe to dandruff and similar affections which destroy the hair. And it leaves the hair soft, fluffy, lustrous, "live."

Supertar lathers instantly—rich and snowy white—in hard or soft water. And it affords an ideal massage.

Pressed, thoroughly seasoned and free from excess moisture, it long outlasts ordinary shampoo soaps, of which a large part wastes away with each day's use.

Let your hair have the delight of a perfect shampoo.

Transparosa

is a clear, transparent soap, every glint of light in whose amber depths sends back a message of purity to the skin.

It is perfumed with a wonderfully delicate, yet lasting attar of roses, which it took thousands of tests to perfect.

Sylvan Toilet Talcum Powder is of exceptionally high quality, and light as thistledown.

It is borated and antiseptic, and most beneficial in cases of chafed, irritated skin, sunburn, prickly heat or chapped hands. It affords a delightful aftermath to a shave or a bath, and is invisible on application.

No other powder has ever approached it in delicacy of fragrance. There are five odors—violet, carnation, lilac, heliotrope and sandalwood. It is sold by all druggists.

In high-grade stores everywhere the Armour Toilet Products are on sale. Try to-day any of those listed below. Each, of its kind, represents the best that nature, aided by the utmost of modern science, can produce.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

A. H., Andover, O. By whose order, when and for what cause was the Alexandrian library destroyed?

There were two libraries at Alexandria in Egypt—one called "the Great Library" and another, "the Daughter," in the Serapeum. In "the Great" were 700,000 volumes. A museum was attached to it. The "Great Library" was destroyed during Cæsar's wars, B.C. 48-47, when Egypt was conquered and became a Roman province. Probably many of the books were rescued and made part of the later library. This "Daughter" library was destroyed by order of Theodosius in A.D. 389. Another library, perhaps containing parts of the older ones, was destroyed in A.D. 640, when the city was taken by the Arabs under Amru, for we read that "John the Grammarian, a famous Peripatetic philosopher, being in Alexandria at the time of its capture, and in high favor with Amru, begged that he would give him the royal library." The caliph Omar, however, denied the request, and for six months the books fed the fires at the public baths.

Mrs. J. L. P., Independence, Va. 1. Is it right for a sinner to teach a Sunday School class, even if he is well read in the Bible? 2. Was Judas ever a true disciple, and was he chosen of Christ?

1. We are all sinners, and we should not be too quick to judge each other. If, however, the teacher in question is living a life of sin, unrepentant and unconverted, he is not qualified to teach others the way of life, no matter how well versed he may be in the Bible. 2. How Judas was chosen is not made clear. He was probably attracted first by curiosity and wonder at the miracles of Christ, and seeing an opportunity for personal advancement and profit, joined the little band of disciples. It is clear that from the very first Jesus knew his character and purpose.

K. B., Lexington, Mass. Is Orange Judd, the American publisher, still living?

No; Mr. Judd died in 1892.

E. D., Rockville, L. I. What is meant by the expression "put in the Fleet," or "condemned to the Fleet," found in some English stories, usually historical stories?

It refers to the Old Fleet Prison. It was founded in Norman times. It was burned in 1666, rebuilt and destroyed by a mob in 1780. Many famous men, including Bishop Hooper, the martyr; Wycherly, the poet, and William Penn, were confined within its walls.

Mrs. M. C. S., Kendalville, Ind. Please state your opinion regarding Sunday labor. Some think it all right, if they work for corporations that demand it.

We have repeatedly stated that the only work that is justifiable on the Lord's day is that which is either of necessity or of mercy. This may seem old-fashioned doctrine; but it is Scripturally sound. One day in seven for rest and worship is a human necessity. It is difficult to advise those who are obliged, either through necessity or by a compulsion which they cannot resist, regarding Sunday labor. It is a great loss to be deprived of all religious privileges on that day, and it would be a fortunate thing for people so situated if they could secure other employment.

S. A., Providence, R. I. Is there a city in one of the Eastern countries named Candy? Tell something about it.

There is the city of Kandy, the old capital of Ceylon. It is near the centre of the island and on an artificial lake. It is seventy-five miles from the new capital Colombo. It is a great religious centre, the temple holding the supposed sacred tooth of Buddha, drawing great crowds of pilgrims. Its population is over 21,000.

Mother, Denver, Col. Why does not THE CHRISTIAN HERALD raise its voice against the atrocity we call the hobble skirt? A more absurd style of dress it would be impossible to imagine.

Some reference to it has already appeared in these pages, but we regard it as a foreign freak, which will never be adopted by sensible American women. In Europe it is already dying out, being condemned as both clumsy and dangerous. It is simply unimaginable for any woman of good taste—but we leave it to the ladies, who will soon dispose of it. Its defenders are having a hard time trying to explain away the accidents it has caused to its wearers, as in the case, the other day, of the hobbled lady who while entering an elevator in a New York building was tripped by her skirt and had both ankles broken.

L. M. L., Meadville, Pa. Give me some facts in regard to the McAll Missions in France.

The first McAll Mission was founded in Paris in 1872 by Dr. R. W. McAll, an English Congregational clergyman. His work grew rapidly and many additional missions were started both in Paris and outside places. Dr. McAll died in 1893. At that time there were 136 mission centres supported by auxiliary societies in America, Scotland and England. The work has been carried on actively and the number of missions has been increased.

C. F. P., Ormonde, Fla. I wish you would tell me of the very darkest, hardest places to send money for missionary work. I have a few hundred dollars to use in such work, but I wish it to go where it will spread the Gospel and let the people know of the love of Jesus. . . . I had rather send through your paper, as it does such wonderful good always.

There are so many needy and deserving foreign mission fields that it would not be difficult to give a long list, but we will mention here only a few of those that are: Missions in Liberia, Angola and the Congo, West Africa, and Rhodesia, East Africa; missions at Moulmein, Burma; Cebu, Philippines; Akashi, Japan; Maracaibo, Venezuela, South America; Nain, Labrador; Shensi, China; Leper Mission, Chandag, India; Leper Mission, Dutch Guiana, South America. These give a wide variety of missionary interests, and to get in touch with the workers themselves would furnish spiritual inspiration for a mission-loving community.

Mrs. A. E. R., Northfield, N. J. In the different papers and magazines I notice mention made of the "secondary boycott." Will you kindly explain what it is?

It is what is known as a subsidiary boycott, as when in a strike, it is desired to defeat one particular trade or firm, by boycotting some other concern which, though it has business relations with the first firm, is not directly involved in the quarrel.

Anxious, Mattoon, Ill. 1. What is Paradise? 2. Was the thief on the cross saved? 3. Would any one repenting on his death-bed have a fear of death if saved?

1. A state of blessedness. The name, originally applied to Eden, the bright and blessed abode which man had lost, was afterward adapted by the Jews to one of the states or conditions of the spiritual world—a place of repose, shelter and joy. 2. Jesus' words clearly implied that the thief was forgiven because of his repentance and his evident faith. 3. A hard question, and impossible to answer satisfactorily. Death-bed repentance cannot remove the sorrow and remorse for a misspent life and the deep regret for opportunities wasted and for wrongs done that might have been set right. But if the repentance, though late, be followed by genuine conversion, the sting and dread of death are taken away.

L. E. B., Orlando, Okla. What is meant by cloven tongues in Acts 2: 3?

The tongues were cloven, that is, had more than a single point; but the Scripture does not say how many. Their appearance was like that of a flame, with several points.

G. L. B., Kokomo, Ind. How can we know that Jesus spoke the exact words that are recorded as his language in the New Testament? Were his words taken by a scribe as uttered?

They were no doubt written down from memory shortly after the event. Reporting, as we know it, was then an unknown art. The best Bible commentators hold that the words of Jesus have been preserved to us, first by oral and later by written records. The four evangelists, who were his contemporaries, doubtless recorded his utterances as they heard and remembered them, and the existence of some slight variations in the records furnishes all the stronger proof of their authenticity. The New Testament records of Jesus' sayings have been universally accepted among scholars throughout the world as authentic, with the exception, of course, of a few sceptics.

Subscriber, Cedar Rapids, Ia. Is it absolutely necessary to make restitution of anything one has become possessed of by mistake, and said mistake not discovered until some time thereafter, especially when such restitution would affect other parties not concerned? Cannot one repent and receive pardon from the Lord, as he knows it was a mistake and not "presumptuous sin"?

Reparation and restitution are duties which (unless through some cause they are impossible of performance) cannot be dispensed with. We should put our sin away from us, if we are to expect the divine forgiveness and blessing. Restitution is an act of justice enjoined by both the Old and New Covenants (Exod. 22: 1; Luke 19: 8). Even if the thing be a mistake, we should not allow others to suffer through our mistake.

M. B., Germantown, Pa. 1. What is the centre of propagation in the present cholera epidemic abroad? 2. What are our government officials doing to protect this country from cholera invasion?

1. Russia is the focus, apparently. The disease has been spreading there for a year or more, and the authorities, apparently, have been unsuccessful in checking it. It has c from Russia to Southern Europe and is epidemic in Italy. There have been se cases in Austria. It is evidently trav westward. 2. Our quarantine authorities taking every precaution to prevent the ad sion of immigrants from cholera ports. is most to be feared, as our Italian inmigr is very large. Our Atlantic and Pacific cities should act energetically and enfor general sanitary clean-up before next sp which will be the time of greatest danger.

Mrs. H. J. H., Reading, Pa. Which is the form to be used in the Lord's Pra Matt. 6: 12, says, "And forgive us debts, as we forgive our debtors." advocate using "Forgive us our trespas as in Matt. 6: 14, 15. Should little dren be taught the first way or the Some one said to me, "We do not forgive our debtors, so we should not it," yet the Bible has it so.

The terms are really interchangeable ar is a matter of personal preference, alth "trespasses" is probably the more frequ used. It more clearly expresses the tho conveyed, which is that God's children, have become like their heavenly Father, do approach him for forgiveness, without ha in their own hearts the forgiving spirit to all their fellow-men.

Boy Scouts of America Parading in New York

DURING the recent visit of General Sir Baden-Powell to New York City, the newly organized Boy Scouts of America paraded in his honor and their fine marching brought hearty applause from the bystanders. The Scouts are growing rapidly in numbers and the visit of the distinguished British General has been of much help to them. The General was the founder of the British organization, which now numbers several hundred thousand manly boys. A banquet in the General's honor was attended by distinguished philanthropists, statesmen and Y. M. C. A. workers from all over the country.

THE MINISTER AND THE MARRIAGE FEE

Some Interesting Facts Concerning a Subject that is Somehow Seldom Discussed by Pastors

By Frederic Walter Norcross

AFTER you have known a clergyman for twenty years, perhaps you can induce him to talk freely about his marriage fees—not before. The subject is too complicated; too personal; too disappointing. When you have broken down the barriers of his reserve, it is probable that he will tell you some highly entertaining stories. At least, you may find them so.

Large wedding fees are rare, even in New York. Fees of $50 and $100 are considered large. The $1,000 fee, when it makes its appearance, usually goes to the rector of a wealthy congregation who enjoys a salary of $10,000 or $12,000 a year. Larger fees are sometimes given. The man of wealth, actuated by a high regard for his pastor and friend, occasionally gives his check for $2,000 or $3,000 under the guise of a wedding fee. He wishes to help the minister, and knows the money would not be accepted under any other circumstances. Such gifts, it is needless to say, are extremely rare.

Some Generous Fees

New York has a few clergymen whose marriage fees average $1,200 a year. The pastor of a large Presbyterian church on Broadway has estimated that his fees amount annually to $1,000. These are top-notch figures. The fee received by an American minister for officiating at the wedding of one of his wealthy parishioners in Paris, a few years ago, is said to have covered the expenses of his four months' vacation on the Continent. Such fees, however, are extraordinary. They are beyond the wildest dreams of the average pastor, who may be able to recall one fee of $50 in his entire ministry.

The amount of the wedding fee is usually dictated by the earning ability of the groom, a large class of men believing they are doing their full duty by the minister when they give him the equivalent of one day's pay. This may be $2.50, $3.00, or $4.00. Even rectors of wealthy congregations testify that these are the average fees. Clergymen assert that the marriage fee is one of the great uncertainties in their experience. The man who is expected to give $25 has a habit of inclosing a $5 bill in the minister's envelope; whereas the young mechanic, who looks as if he needed every dollar to pay for the new furniture, will surprise the minister by giving $10. Many give less. A Baptist minister in Chicago once received a fee consisting of a silver quarter, one dime, two five-cent pieces and five pennies. He always had an impression that a collection was taken among members of the wedding party for the impecunious groom.

A Methodist minister in Baltimore recently married a young man of the Bowery type who asked him, at the conclusion of the ceremony in the parsonage, how much he "charged." As a hint to the clergyman to keep his fee within reasonable limits, the young man drew a half dollar from his pocket while speaking. The minister explained that no "charge" was made for his services. Whereupon the delighted young husband exclaimed, "Do you hear that, Mag? he don't charge nothin'!" and dropped the half dollar back into his pocket.

But the pastor had more to say. He told his visitor that the fee depended on the valuation he placed on the service rendered. If it was worth nothing to marry the young woman at his side, very good; but if he valued her his fee would give some evidence of it. The groom was impressed. Slowly he produced the half dollar and laid it in the minister's hand. A $1 bill followed. Then he grasped his bride's arm and moved toward the door.

Clerical Surprises

It frequently happens that the minister, upon opening his envelope, finds a note, or a blank sheet of paper, instead of a fee. The notes give a variety of reasons for the groom's inability to pay. "My pocket was picked on the way to the parsonage;" "I am a little short of cash;" or "I have no money at present, but will pay you later on," are common excuses.

The Rev. Dr. George E. Reed, President of Dickinson College, tells of receiving a letter from a man he married, which read:

> DEAR DOCTOR: My wife is the best of women; in fact, all that a man could desire. I intend to send you a substantial token of my appreciation of the happiness you have given me.

But the "substantial token" never arrived.

The Rev. Dr. Herman L. Duhring, superintendent of the Protestant Episcopal City Mission, in Philadelphia, had a similar experience. Upon opening his envelope, on one occasion, he found a scrap of newspaper, with a note scribbled along the margin. It read:

> DEAR DOCTOR: I am awfully hard up, and hope you won't be offended if I ask you to marry me on trust. You'll get your money some day.

An Odd Dilemma

Although the wedding took place fifteen years ago, Dr. Duhring never received his fee, and he has come to the conclusion that he never will. The same clergyman relates how his fee paid for the refreshments at a wedding reception. It was a home wedding, and at the close of the service the groom handed Dr. Duhring a $5 bill. An hour later, while the reception was in progress, the young man came to the minister and, stammering with embarrassment, asked him to return the money. He explained that the caterer's man was in the kitchen and refused to leave the ice cream and cake until the bill was paid. The bride's family had no money; he had no money, and unless the clergyman came to their aid, they would be subjected to the humiliation of sending their guests away without serving refreshments. Dr. Duhring returned the fee, and the "humiliation" was avoided.

Occasionally the minister is victimized. This occurred in Philadelphia a dozen years ago when an elderly clergyman of an Episcopal Church was called upon to marry a well dressed young stranger, who claimed to be related to a prominent New

THE TEARS OF JESUS

TEXT—Ps. 56:8

IN the cabinets of antiquaries is often to be seen a small bottle found in ancient tombs, side by side with a lamp and other articles, which are presumed, from their position, to have some meaning in connection with death. The bottle is called a lachrymatory, or tear-bottle, and is supposed to have contained the tears of some bereaved relatives of the departed one who was laid in the tomb. The tears which were thus stored up must have been regarded as having a certain value, and one quite understands the sentiment which looked at them in this light. And in our fallen and degraded nature there is perhaps no better feature, no more significant relic of what it once was as it came from the Creator's hands, than natural affection to relatives and friends. In this quarter humanity seems to struggle up for a moment out of the selfishness which has engulfed it. This tear-bottle, then, may be regarded as a touching acknowledgment on the part of the heathen that one of the best and purest things which can come out of man in his fallen state is love and longing for those who are bound to him by the ties of blood and friendship.

God's Tear-Bottles

Whether there is any trace of the tear-bottles having been used in Jewish interments, I cannot say; but certainly the Psalmist's thoughts seem to travel in very much the same line when he prays, "Put thou my tears into thy bottle." His were the tears, as you will see by referring to the context, of persecuted innocence, or, rather, of persecuted piety. He is oppressed by his enemies, who are daily at hand to swallow him up; yet he puts his trust in God, and resolves not to fear what flesh can do unto him. It was a grand sentiment of the heathen that the gods love to see a good man struggling up against adversity, for that then the greatness of the human soul most comes out. And there is here, you see, a kindred thought, only consecrated and sanctified by the true religion of which the Jew was an inheritor. God does love to see the patience and the faith of his sorrowing servants. He counts and treasures up in his lachrymatory all their tears; and these tears, irradiated by his love as the dewdrops of the early morning, shall become jewels in their crowns hereafter; for "they that sow in tears shall reap in joy," and so the persecuted Psalmist prays that it may be with himself. "Put thou my tears into thy bottle."

I shall speak to you, however, of One greater than the Psalmist—One whose language the Psalmist, by prophetic anticipation, speaks. We know, on the authority of the Scriptures themselves, that the experience of the suffering Psalmist of Israel often represents beforehand the experience of the Son of God. The treachery of Judas, the presentation of gall and vinegar, the piercing of our blessed Lord's sacred hands and feet by the nails of the cross, all these circumstances, you remember, are predicted in the Psalms under color of the writer's own experience. Now, then, we will apply a similar principle in the interpretation of this Psalm. In the plaint—"Every day they wrest my words: all their thoughts are against me for evil. They gather themselves together, they hide themselves, they mark my steps, when they wait for my soul"—we see the wicked Pharisees and priests plotting against our Lord, and seeking to catch something out of his mouth, so that they may deliver him to the power and authority of the governor; and in the words "Put thou my tears into thy bottle," we hear his petition that God would set store by his tears and troubles, and cause them to be laid out before him for an everlasting memorial—a prayer which has been abundantly answered, for are not those tears and troubles the ransom of our souls?

The "Man of Sorrows"

Our Lord's life was throughout characterized by sorrow. He was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; yet he is only recorded to have been moved to tears three times. Now, then, believing that the silence of Scripture is often as significant as its speech, I will first briefly call attention to the occasion on which our Lord is not said to have wept. Weeping, then, is not one of the incidents of the crucifixion of Christ. The sufferings inflicted on him by men are never said to have moved our Lord to tears. Indeed, we can see that they could not have done so, I think. To weep because insult or violence is offered to ourselves may be very pardonable in poor frail mortals, but it is weak. Now, we may not connect with our Lord's character a single thought of moral weakness. Tender he was, with more than a woman's tenderness toward the sufferings of others; his tears were a full sluice, ready at all times to flow where the sufferings or sins of men unlocked the fountain. As the seed of the woman, he had all the feminine graces of sympathy and compassionateness in full blossom; for with these were united a most brave endurance—the man's stern resolve not to be moved to tears by mere cruelty or violence to self. Accordingly, when his blood flows, his tears do not flow; when his sacred flesh is punctured by the thorns and the nails, there is no convulsive sob, no burst of bitter anguish, but a silent, dignified, and most majestic patience. The tears of Christ are a liquor too generous, too precious to be poured as a libation over his own sufferings. Before we pass on, I call you to study with admiration the human character of our Lord Jesus, at once infinitely tender and infinitely strong. This human character is the mirror in which we see God's own perfections reflected, for Christ, we read, is "the express image of God's perfections," and "he that hath seen Jesus hath seen the Father." God grant that, beholding in this glass the glory of the Lord, we may be morally transformed by the sight, changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.

Tears for the World's Sin

If, then, our Lord was never moved to tears by the cruelties which men inflicted upon him, when did he weep? First, the Epistle to the Hebrews tells us that "in the days of his flesh he offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears." He offered up tears "to Him who was able to save him from death." He alludes, evidently, to the agony in the garden, when our blessed Lord besought God with intense earnestness that the cup might pass from him, that "his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground." These are tears which we cannot fully understand. Thus much only we know: that they must have been tears for sin, and for the wrath of God, due to and consequent upon sin; and since "in him was no sin," they must have been tears for the sins of the world, the weight of which in that most mysterious agony he was bearing. He had made himself one with us by his incarnation. He represented us before God, and accordingly he wept for our sins—for your sins and mine, for the danger to which they expose us, and for the sorrows with which they would pierce our souls, as if the sins had been his own. And can we sin freely after that? Brethren, should it not be a check upon us in the very hour of temptation to remember that this act which we contemplate doing wrung tears from our blessed Lord in the garden? If he wept for our sins, shall we be so utterly hard-hearted as not to weep for our own?

The "Sublime Verse"

But we turn from this passage to those occasions in the Gospel where our Lord is said to have wept. It is, perhaps, the sublimest verse in the Bible which records one of the occasions, and the most striking example anywhere to be found of the truth that the greatest simplicity is the highest sublimity. When sorrowing relatives showed our Lord the way to the grave of his friend—when he marked the evident distress of the mourners, and especially of the mourning sisters whom he so much loved—he did not disdain to mingle his tears with theirs. But perhaps I express myself unguardedly; for it appears to me that the apostle of love, who records the scene, rather makes a studied distinction between his tears and theirs, mentioning them in the gross as the tears of the poor sinful mortals, hardly initiated into those profound mysteries of sin, sorrow, and death which must call for tears—"When Jesus, therefore, saw her weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her." But regarding his tears, the narrative is adequate and most profound, with a pause of dignity before and after the record: "Jesus wept." Brethren, without presuming to the depth of the emotion which our Lord on that occasion manifested, we may at all events say, from the connection in which that incident occurs, that by shedding those tears he has sanctified for us the sorrow of natural affection. And this simple statement involves more lessons than we are at first sight aware of. There are some people who so caricature spirituality that they represent the spiritual man as hardly touched at all by natural calamities, such as poverty, pain, and bereavement.

The Sin of Undue Grief

For example, they are impatient with the poor when they seem wrapped up in their temporal distress, and form harsh judgments of others in a better condition of life, who feel very sensibly such inevitable trials as the loss of friends. Now, without at all denying that our grief for any worldly calamity may be unduly indulged, or that there is such a sin popular with the better people as that which Edward Irving so justly stigmatized as "the idolatry of the natural affections," we are yet forced to say that the example of our blessed Lord is all against such overwrought sentiment. Our Lord, who cared in the first instance to feed their souls by his Word, would not send the multitude who had heard him fasting to their own homes, lest they should faint by the way. Our Lord, after raising Jairus' daughter, showed himself considerate of the exhaustion she had undergone by commanding that something should be given her to eat. Our Lord finally wept in unison with sorrowing sisters over the grave of their brother; by all which incidents we are taught very pointedly this lesson: that the emotions and sentiments which the varied fortunes of life give rise to are not to be suppressed and stifled as tokens of a natural and unregenerated mind, but to be sanctified by seeking in them the presence, the support, and the sympathy of our incarnate God. One great end of the Lord's becoming incarnate was that he might minister to us all the strength and comfort of his sympathy in those trying periods of our career. Of a god who never proceeded to take human flesh, and by so doing to identify himself with human trials, it could hardly have been said as it was said of the God of the Bible, "in all their afflictions he was afflicted." Blessed Lord, who didst condescend to sympathize with all our sorrows, raise us up thereby to such sort of sympathy as our fallen nature admits with thine!

Sorrowing Over Jerusalem

We now come to the last occasion on which our Lord is said to have wept. It was an occasion in every way remarkable. There was but one hour in our Lord's life, and that a very short-lived hour, in which he triumphed; once before, indeed, immediately after the miracle of feeding the five thousand, the tide of popular enthusiasm rose high in his favor, and would have borne him on had he permitted it, until it placed him upon an earthly throne. Now, for a few moments, he condescends to ride upon the tide of popular enthusiasm, unwilling to restrain the outburst of homage which was gushing forth from many grateful lips, and now would have been the moment when a mere philanthropist who had devoted his whole life to efforts in the cause of suffering humanity would have felt his cheek suffused with a glow of pardonable pride and pleasure, and would have whispered to himself, "Now at length they recognize my services; and detraction itself, which hitherto has dogged my steps, hides its diminished head, and is cowed by this acclamation and applause."

But not so the Divine Man, the only partaker of humanity in whom humanity has had no taint of selfishness. As David's day of triumph was stained with tears for a lost child: "Oh, my son Absalom, my son, my son!"—so the day of triumph of the Son of David is stained by tears for the children of his country, and for the city of God's solemnities, now finally given over to a reprobate mind. "When he was come near he beheld the city and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong to thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes." The sorrow turns not upon his own approaching doom, but exclusively upon the doom of others—the doom which had been brought about by resistance of all God's offers of mercy, and a wilful non-recognition of the day of grace. It is this sorrow which most broods pon his mind in his latest hours. The ccents of it again burst from his lips s he was toiling up the Dolorous Way the place of execution. "Daughters Jerusalem, weep not for me, but eep for yourselves and for your chil-ren." Well, that which he forbade ie daughters of Jerusalem to do he ill not do himself. He has no tears or his own inconceivable sorrows. is tears were for the sins and conse-uent sorrows of his people.

The tears of our blessed Lord over erusalem sanctioned entirely the sen-ment of patriotism, as his tears over ie grave of Lazarus sanctioned the omestic affections. That love of ountry which some think narrow and xclusive—which cannot, according to ieir views, consist with universal hilanthropy—that love our blessed ord felt for the land of his nativity nd for the city of God's solemnities, ie metropolis of the land. We need ot then be at all ashamed, as follow-rs of Christ, when we feel a strong ttachment for our own beloved coun-y; we need not suppress, nay, we ay freely indulge, the sentiment hich rises in our minds, whenever we re in the midst of foreign scenery and stoms, of love for our native land.

But what a lesson our blessed Lord eaches us, as to the true and pure rm which our patriotism should ke! As a natural instinct patriot-m may be felt by the natural man, ut in the Christian the natural in-incts are taken into the current of ie spiritual life, and all of them are olored by religious principle. Our ord, indeed, weeps over the sufferings his people, but it is over those suf-rings as brought about by their own erversity—over their forfeiture of ie day of grace, and their rejection the offers which have been made to em through his ministry. "If thou adst known, even thou, at least in is thy day, the things which belong nto thy peace!" Now, does patriot-m ever take at all the same form nong ourselves? Does the patriotism men who have their country's high-t good at heart ever deplore national ns as well as national disasters? oes it ever lead us to make reflection at if the Lord hath not, as I believe hath not, dealt so with any nation, is high privilege entails a corre-onding national responsibility?

Finally, observe how the natural eling of patriotism should be sanc-ied. Our Lord does not, indeed, ay for Jerusalem, because he knew at, in consequence of her rejection himself, the guilty city was now st prayer; still, he does speak in a rt of devout aspiration concerning r: "If thou hadst known, even ou." Prayer for her was in his art. He would have prayed had it en permitted, and if prayer would ve prevailed. Pray we then, breth-n, and pray we earnestly, for our loved country. Let us make it a nscientious duty to do so regularly; ay we that she may not come der the indictment against Jerusa-n, of throwing away opportunities, d disregarding the time of grace; ay that she may not be allowed to ert an influence greater than other tion was ever before entrusted with, merely aggrandizing herself and larging her dominion; but that the oral forces wherewith God has en-wed her may be used for him in hting the oppressed throughout the rld, in avowing his name gallantly, propagating his truth.

The tears of Christ, like all his fferings, are a fruitful field of edifi-tion. There is a spiritual lesson in ch drop which falls from those pierc-g, tender eyes, the eyes whose glance claimed Peter and struck to the rth as dead the apostle of love him-lf. God has stored up those tears in s lachrymatory; may they be stored also for devout meditation, and ch poor sympathy as we can yield to em, in the cabinet of our minds.

A LITTLE CHILD AND A BIG MAN

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

WHO was the wisest man? You should know his name, for every child should love him. Right you are—Solomon was the wisest man. How came he to be so wise? When God gave him his choice of all gifts he selected wisdom. What proof have we that Solomon was a very wise man? The first proof the Bible gives will interest you. Two women with one little child came to Solomon. There had been two children, but one died. Each woman claimed the living child was hers. Solomon was to decide which woman was the mother of the living child. That was a hard question. Children do not always look like their parents. I knew a woman who told a mother how very much her child looked like her—just her image. The woman smiled; she was the child's step-mother.

How could Solomon decide which woman was the mother? Solomon looked at the one child and the two women, and said, "Bring me a sword." The sword was brought and Solomon said, "Divide the living child in two, and give half to one and half to the other." One woman said, "That is right, divide it." But the other woman loved the child and said, "O my lord, give her the living child, and in no wise slay it." Her heart of love went out to the child. Solomon knew that the woman who wanted to save the child's life was its mother. In this act Solomon proved that he was a very wise man.

ANY one who seeks for wisdom and asks God to help him can be as wise as Solomon. Solomon did not believe that all the wisdom of the world was wrapped up in his brain. Like a good father he talked to children and told them how to get wisdom. I have one of his chats with children and you can read it. "Hear, ye children, the instruction of a father, and attend to know understanding. For I give you good doctrine, forsake ye not my law. For I was my father's son, tender and only beloved in the sight of my mother. He taught me also, and said unto me, Let thine heart retain my words: keep my commandments, and live. Get wisdom, get understanding: forget it not; neither decline from the words of my mouth. Forsake her not, and she shall preserve thee: love her, and she shall keep thee. Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding. Exalt her, and she shall promote thee: she shall bring thee to honor, when thou dost embrace her. She shall give to thine head an ornament of grace: a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee."

MR. W. H. VAIL, of Newark, N. J., sent me a story about wisdom, and I will pass it on to you. Read it and pass it on to others. This will make you a member of the "Pass-It-On Society." The story will show you how any thoughtful person can become as wise as Solomon if he will only try. Solomon is dead, but God is not dead. You can be as wise as Solomon if you will keep your eyes open, think about what you see, pray often, and keep on thinking.

THE little Arabian tale of the dervish shall be the proof of this truth. A dervish was journeying alone in the desert, when two merchants suddenly met him. "You have lost a camel," said he to the merchants. "Indeed we have," they replied. "Was he not blind in his right eye, and lame in his left leg?" said the dervish. "He was," replied the merchants. "Had he not lost a front tooth?" said the dervish. "He had," replied the merchants. "And was he not loaded on one side with honey and wheat on the other?" "Most certainly he was," they replied. "And as you have seen him so lately, and marked him so particularly, you can, in all probability, conduct us to him."

"My friends," said the dervish, "I have never seen your camel, nor even heard of him but from you." "A pretty story, truly!" said the merchants, "but where are the jewels which formed a part of his cargo?" "I have neither seen your camel, nor your jewels," repeated the dervish. On this they seized his person, and forthwith hurried him before the cadi, where, on the strictest search, nothing could be found upon him, nor could any evidence whatever be adduced to convict him, either of falsehood or of theft.

THEY were about to proceed against him as a sorcerer, when the dervish, with great calmness, thus addressed the court: "I have been much amused with your surprise, and own that there has been some ground for your suspicions, but I have lived long and alone, and I can find ample scope for observation, even in a desert. I knew that I had crossed the track of a camel that had strayed from its owner, because I saw no mark of human footstep on the same route. I knew that the animal was blind in one eye, because it had cropped the herbage only on one side of its path, and I perceived that it was lame in one leg, from the faint impression which that particular foot had produced upon the sand. I concluded that the animal had lost one tooth, because wherever it had grazed a small tuft of herbage was left uninjured, in the centre of the bite. As to what formed the burden of the beast, the busy ants informed me that it was corn on the one side, and the clustering bees that it was honey on the other."

READ all of Solomon's chats with children. Remember that your eyes were made to see and your brain was made to think about all your eyes see. Think and pray, pray and think, and you can become even wiser than Solomon.

A MODEST HERO

WILLIAM MACGREGOR, a young Scotch doctor (writes F. A. Atkins in the Christian Endeavor World), had succeeded so well as chief medical officer at Mauritius that he was made commissioner at Fiji. An English ship, with a number of Indian coolies on board, struck on a reef near Suva, and began to break up. Macgregor's life was much more valuable than the lives of the coolies, but he was not guided by the gospel of the jungle. So he went at once to the rescue, and by means of a rope and a broken mast saved many lives. The besotted crew had got at the spirits, and finally a woman that was mad with drink fell overboard into the surf. Two men jumped in after her, and all three were being swept helplessly out to sea. Macgregor let himself down by a rope, caught the woman's hair in his teeth, grasped the two men with his hands, and brought all three back in safety.

When the young commissioner sent in his report of the shipwreck to the government, he never mentioned the part he had taken in the rescue. The other rescuers, reported and praised by him, received the Royal Humane Society's medal. But no one knew that Macgregor had been anywhere near the wreck until some one told the story to Queen Victoria, who herself conferred on the modest hero the Albert medal. To-day the young doctor is Sir William Macgregor, Governor of Newfoundland.

Snapshots

—Live clean, pray and put God first, if you would enjoy a peaceful, fruitful and victorious life.

—Be bold to confess the Saviour, remembering that God has no dumb children, and that you are his witness in the world.

—Be a worker and not a shirker in the kingdom of God; be cheerful and courageous, looking straight to God for help and blessing.

—To win souls to Christ is the greatest and best work in the world. It is the first business of the minister, the church and the individual Christian.

—The supernatural is the backbone of the Bible. The miraculous element is a badge of its divine origin. If men could understand it to perfection then men might have written it.

—God puts no round pegs into square holes. He gives to every man the talents with which, under existing circumstances, he may do his level best and achieve the greatest honor.

—"One sinner destroyeth much good," and a minister who is a "sore-head" is the chief of sinners in soul-winning work. The unsympathetic pastor ofttimes discourages his own people by the indifferent or hostile attitude which he assumes.

Carrying Produce by Motor Cars

Mr. Giles Barbour, of Littleton, Mass., is the first farmer to have his produce brought into Boston by motor car. He had been repeatedly told that the produce would be crushed and damaged by the jarring of the vehicle. A full load of produce was placed in the car and the manufacturer's agent even insisted on taking a basket of eggs along. On the way, they passed many farmers who had left Littleton four or five hours earlier in their horse-drawn wagons. On arrival at Boston, the produce was found to be in splendid condition and not even an egg shell had been broken. Eight hours had been saved on the trip and now Mr. Barbour is an enthusiastic advocate of the new method of transportation.

America Visited by Its Only Sultan

WHEN we acquired the Philippine Islands back in the stirring days of 1898, when the Stars and Stripes were being carried into various Spanish possessions, and carried to stay, we also acquired a full-fledged Sultan, whose name has been made so familiar to American ears by song and story that they have almost come to believe that his majesty the Sultan of Sulu was a myth. He is, however, very much alive and has just arrived on American soil to see at close range what sort of people we are, and as the government and various people have been doing their best to show him the sights, from the Capitol at Washington to Coney Island, it is thought that his stay will be an enjoyable one.

He started around the world, taking in India, parts of Asia, and then Europe, and will see America last of all before returning to his capital city of Jolo, which is a real place on the map, despite the almost unreal festivity of its name.

In addition to having the title of Sultan, he bears the name of Hadji Mohammed Jamalui Kiram II. The Sultan formerly held almost undisputed sway over one hundred and forty islands of the Philippine Archipelago. The islands stretched from Mindanao almost to Borneo.

The Sultan lost many of his powers when the islands were taken under the Stars and Stripes. He had to pull down no ensign; for, strange to relate, the Sultan has never had a standard, and now he seems quite well satisfied to own allegiance to our colors. He has modern ideas and is anxious, it is said, that more schools be established among his people. The Sultan inherited his title and islands from a warlike ancestor named Puguian the Great. Kiram's father died in 1894, and he made the city of Jolo his capital on his accession. After the close of the Spanish War and the suppression of the insurrection in the Philippines, he was made by our government the Presidente of Jolo, which means in fact that he is permanent mayor.

The islands over which he ruled have some of the richest pearl fisheries in the world, and his revenue from this source alone is said to have been no less than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year. This source of revenue is now gone, and his regular income is about nine thousand dollars a year. Part of this comes from a yearly payment made by the British Trading Company of North Borneo. Our government pays him a salary of $150 per month.

The Sultan has his wife with him. Unlike most sultans, he has only one. In their suite was his interpreter, Charles J. Werble; the Sultan's brother, Dato Raja Muda Mulalil Wasit, who is heir-apparent, and three advisers, Rasul, son of the Prime Minister, Tahir and Mohammed. All of these are known as hadjis, which means that as devout Mohammedans they, as well as their royal master, have made a pilgrimage to Mecca. A servant, Maaydno, claims descent from the prophet Mahomet, and consequently is treated by all the party with great respect. The interpreter Werble has had an interesting career. He was once a soldier in the Seventeenth Infantry; later served in the artillery, and then became a school teacher. He became a close friend of the Sultan and it was he who persuaded him to take the present journey around the world.

The Sultan of Sulu (centre), His Brother, and Major H. L. Scott, U. S. A.

The Sultan has, however, a large and valuable collection of pearls and one of the reasons for his trip was to dispose of part of these. Some of the pearls were sold in Singapore; then others found purchasers in Colombo, Suez, Naples, Genoa, Paris and London. One button-shaped pearl sold in Paris for about six thousand dollars, while one hundred thousand dollars were paid by gem-loving Londoners for some of the best specimens. The money, it is said, will be used in part to provide more schoo teachers for the Sultan's people.

The Sultan came to New York on board th steamship St. Louis. Orders were sent from Wash ington to expedite his baggage and that all of hi personal effects should be admitted free of duty

Major Hugh L. Scott, at one time superintenden of the West Point Military Academy, came on fro Washington to receive his majesty and act as ad visor and escort on his various trips. The Majo was a one-time governor of the Jolo Archipelago and is an old friend of the nation's guest. Th entire party was installed in one o New York's fashionable hotels, wher they aroused much curiosity amon the guests. The Sultan appeared i the evening wearing a round blac velvet cap with a band of red, but hi clothes showed that they were Euro pean in general style and cut. Th trousers were very tight, and hi cutaway coat fitted with the close ness of a military surtout. He wa taller than most Americans though he would be, judging from the por traits of him which have been pub lished in this country. He is a littl over five feet five inches in height and a stiff black pompadour make him look a little more.

He enjoyed seeing the high build ings of New York and paid thi graceful compliment to the metropo lis when he returned from his firs motor trip: "Paris is a paradise, bu New York is more than Paris." S anxious was he to see every hig building that he turned most of th interviewers over to Mr. Werble t let him say what he would about th trip. He expressed a desire to se the Vanderbilt cup race on Lon Island.

From New York he went to se President Taft, with whom he ha become acquainted during the Presi dent's long service in the Philippines

Major Scott took him to see the greater part o New York and Brooklyn before he hurried on t Washington. On leaving, he expressed himself a greatly pleased with his visit, and said that h wished to return. It is thought that he will spen more time in New York before his visit to thi country is at an end. If he does so, it is prob able that he will visit the aviation grounds o Long Island and indulge in the thrilling pleasure o a flight in a biplane, something they have not ye seen at Jolo. He may if the Sultan takes as muc interest in flying machines as he has in other up-to date inventions he has come across on his memorabl trip.

THE BUILDERS OF THE SKYSCRAPERS

See illustrations on opposite page

NEXT to marveling at the tremendous height to which the modern American skyscraper raises its roof, we admire the intrepid workers in stone, iron and steel who are changing the aspect of our American cities by the great towers they clamp and rivet together hundreds of feet above the city streets. One cannot go far in New York without seeing a skyscraper under construction, and often a little knot of people will be gathered on the other side of the street watching with upturned faces the men on the twelfth, fifteenth, thirtieth or even fortieth story, who look smaller than insects and who work as calmly as if the misstep of two inches would not send them hurtling into another world. It is the order in some work that the men are on no account to look up, the glare above often giving a feeling of dizziness when the men again look into the depths below. Looking downward, however, seems to have little effect on the cool nerves of the workers in this line of construction.

In all skyscrapers the steel frame is usually ten or more stories up before the brick, stone, or concrete covering is applied, and the steel-men, working under the guidance of trained engineers, have the most difficult and dangerous task to perform. Often they go aloft on the steel hoisting hooks, or astride a steel girder. They straddle narrow beams, drill, rivet and join girders with as little concern as if they were in their shops. After the steel frame has been completed in the lower stories and bears a close resemblance to an overgrown cage the brick-layers get to work. Usually they start their wall of brick or artificial stone on a steel support several stories in the air and soon the whole structure is covered with what at first look like patches of masonry. The great keystones over windows and doors are put up in the rough and are carved with decorative designs after the building is practically completed.

The modern high office building rises with startling rapidity. A few months ago at the corner of Astor Place and Broadway laborers were busily engaged in digging a hole in the crust of Manhattan equal to several stories in depth. Soon the foundations for the sidewalks were going in; the steel-men put up their derricks and the huge frame began to rise. At this writing the steel frame is well above most of the old buildings in the neighborhood and three stories of masonry have been completed. It will not be very many weeks before office room in the new structure will be listed with the real estate brokers.

On the opposite page are some illustrations of buildings in the process of construction in the lower part of the city. Where they stand there stood a row of small brick houses with their gable ends to the street in the days "when old New York was young." The workmen could almost throw a stone to the spot where Fort Amsterdam used to raise its frowning battlements that citizens of New York might sleep sound o' nights without fear of being pulled out of their beds by Spanish pirates or French sailors.

From the topmost girders one can look for twenty miles over the second city of the world; the first so far as its stupendous structures are concerned. All of them can be seen from the top of the new structure near Battery Park. There is the American Surety Company's building, three hundred and six feet high, with twenty-three stories; the American Tract Society building, of the same height; the Heidelberg, four hundred and ten feet high, with thirty stories; the Metropolitan Life Insurance building, seven hundred feet high, divided into fifty stories; the Park Row building, whose towers rise three hundred and eighty-two feet above street level; the Singer building, over six hundred and twelve feet high, divided into forty-one stories; the St. Paul building, three hundred and eight feet high; the Times building, four hundred and nineteen feet high, and the Pulitzer building, over three hundred and seventy-five feet high. The list of buildings which range in height from two hundred to three hundred feet is a long one, and is constantly growing. The New Municipal building, when completed, will be over four hundred feet high. It seems but yesterday when a ten-story building was regarded with amazement, yet the announcement that in the near future one would be built to reach one thousand feet above the narrow city street creates no feeling that an impossible task is before the engineers; on the contrary it is regarded as the inevitable result of the present race to construct tall buildings. At the close of the Civil War a building four stories in height was regarded as a fair-sized business structure, but that was before the city had spread over a good part of four counties.

House-Cleaning

FRAUD investigations now seem to be epidemic. They have them at the present time in Columbus and Ashtabula, O.; Schenectady, Buffalo, Utica, Albany and New York City, N. Y.; Granville City, Springfield and Chicago, Ill.; Harrisburg and Pittsburg, Pa.; Boston and Lowell, Mass.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Grand Rapids, Mich.; St. Louis, Mo.; San Francisco, Calif.; Norfolk, Va.; and Hoboken, N. J. Pretty extensive house-cleaning, this! The "Awakening of the Public Conscience" is not a myth after all. Good will come of it, if the standard of public morals and official efficiency is raised thereby. Meanwhile, we may well stand amazed at the giant influence of wrong-doing, even in those who may be regarded as unimportant. A very small man in an insignificant post does a wrong act, and the scales that measure the interests of millions of people are instantly affected. A jest, or a misstatement, or a slander that cost only a moment to set down with pen and ink, may corrupt the imaginations and befoul the consciences of thoughtless thousands. A momentary yielding to the temptation to use public office for private gain, will blast an otherwise good reputation and very likely destroy others. Rigid honesty and truthfulness are the only basis of action, in public or private life, that will stand the test of scrutiny and give ultimate satisfaction. The man who offends against these, though he be endowed with many estimable qualities, must ultimately go to the wall.

Vultures and Their Prey

AS long as human nature remains weak and credulous, and as long as the desire for wealth is cherished by the great majority, so long will the class of vultures known as "get-rich-quick" men continue to prey with more or less success on the defenseless public. But why should the public be continually exposed to such notorious swindles as those of the firm of Wall Street brokers whose principal members, together with their books, were bundled off in a police patrol wagon the other day and taken to jail by post office detectives? This concern has been conducting for years past a large business with branches in six other populous cities and, of course, with palatial headquarters in New York, where it kept 100 stenographers busy. It is charged with using the mails to defraud the public. A Stock Exchange authority estimates that it has spent over $5,000,000 in advertising its fraudulent mining schemes. It will strike the average citizen, who reads this story, that if the columns of the daily newspapers were closed to all such schemes, and if no concern were advertised that could not stand reasonable investigation, the great art of swindling by "get-rich-quick" methods would soon die a natural death. Its demise would be a positive blessing to thousands of the class who now furnish most of its dupes.

The Unrest in China

ACCORDING to recent information from official circles in Peking there seems danger that a dark chapter in the history of the Celestial Empire may be repeated if precautions are not taken by the Chinese government and by other nations which have great interests in that country, our own included. The American public will recall that about a decade ago there came reports of uprisings in various parts of China which at first caused little alarm. They seemed sporadic and likely to subside as quickly as they came, leaving little to mark the outbursts. They seemed to have no particular connection in the beginning. Later, the bands united and then came the terrible Boxer insurrection which deluged several provinces with blood, and cost the lives of many foreign missionaries, envoys, merchants and soldiers before it was suppressed. The foreign legations were nearly wiped out, and only saved by the quick march of a combined force of Americans and Europeans to the rescue. The American Minister in China, William J. Calhoun, is not an alarmist, but he has been carefully watching the trend of events in China, and he has found such a spirit of unrest, so many signs which point to another outbreak of a character similar to that of the Boxers, that he has wisely taken precautions to protect Americans and American interests instead of waiting until the proverbial eleventh hour, as has so often been done in our relations with other countries with disastrous results.

Mr. Calhoun sent the reports of conditions in China to the State Department, and then asked Rear-Admiral Hubbard, who commands the fleet in Asiatic waters, to be ready to land a force. The admiral fortunately has at least ten ships of the gunboat class within call, and an officer of marines has gone to Peking to take command of the guard which has been posted at the legation in that city ever since the Boxer outbreak. Of course, any troops we would have at hand in case of a sudden insurrection would seem pitifully weak and small compared with the thousands who might be ready to block their path, but discipline counts for much, and our sailors and marines are not the men to hesitate, no matter how disproportionate their numbers might be compared to the insurgents.

There are several reasons for the present condition of affairs in China. There is a party of intelligent men who see that China's only hope of remaining in control of her own affairs is to reform her antiquated methods of government and bring the nation abreast of the times. They have accomplished much, but they are hampered by the great mass of the people who would like to see all innovations abolished and have their country return to her sleep of centuries. Then the acquisition of Korea by Japan has alarmed a great many who foresee the expansion of Japanese authority until all hope of regaining Manchuria must be abandoned. Russia evidently has a secret understanding with Japan which bodes no good for the already harassed country. China's greatest foe, however, is within herself. An uprising and the massacre of inoffensive foreigners, who only wish her well, would give a longed-for excuse for partitioning her territory to many who have looked with greedy eyes on some of her richest provinces. For the sake of China herself it is to be hoped that she can quell any disorder that may arise.

An Experiment Both Ways

FEW young cities have passed through so rapid yet so conclusive an experience in temperance as Rockford, Ill. Several years ago, the citizens decided against the saloons and for two years there was not a single drinking-place in town. Business was good, people saved money, and the banks reported increased deposits. Then the citizens took the opposite tack and decided to give the saloons another trial—but on the promise of obedience to State and local laws and good behavior generally. They were to be "model" saloons. The first day the bars were opened, thirty-nine arrests were made for rioting in the streets. According to the Rockford Republican, it was a case of "mobs of liquor-made rioters, constituting a vindication of the 'dry' campaign . . . It is evidently impossible for the police department to take proper care of the output of Rockford's saloons." Another Rockford paper, the Star, after reviewing the situation, remarks: "It is hardly an exaggeration to say that there was more immoderate drinking and public intoxication yesterday than during a whole year under the 'dry' régime." These unfortunate experiences would seem inevitably to lead to the conclusion that a saloon can only be good when it is closed for good.

Explosive Infidelity

DARWIN once observed with fine candor that "all our knowledge of the universe and its problems is something like a hen's knowledge of a forty-acre field, in one corner of which she has been scratching." We commend his observation to those Western professors who, in their contributions to the monthly literary organ of a divinity school, decide with a few flourishes of the pen the greatest problems that have engaged the attention of man since the morning of the world. Some few years ago, one of the bright lights of this wonderful school laid down a new plan for converting the heathen by the use of magic lanterns and microscopes. Gospel effort and the use of the Bible were termed "jungle preaching," and the methods of the missionaries were held up to derision. Later, another of these scientific theologians launched on a defenseless public a book in which, to his own satisfaction at least, he demolished every system of religion and all the churches from Moses down to Moody. Christianity and the Bible were taken bitterly to task for "gagging science." The God of the Bible was not the God of to-day. Now, a still bolder attack is made, in the same style, by another of these wise professors, who undertakes to explode the whole system of Christianity simply by denying all its essentials! The very immoderation of the attack defeats its purpose in the minds of all thoughtful, serious people. Knowledge of the reality of spiritual things comes from the Spirit, and not from the university classroom. Any other than this spiritual knowledge becomes "a stumbling block to the weak." And right here is the greatest danger, when those who hold distinctly infidel views and who mock at things they cannot understand having no spiritual light in themselves, are in a position to impress their wild vagaries upon younger minds that are as yet incapable of forming a judgment on the great moral and spiritual issues.

General Notes

—MAYOR GAYNOR of New York is now fully restored to health and will shortly resume the duties of his office. No attempt has yet been made to extract the bullet from his throat.

—78,000 PERSONS have died of cholera in Russia in the last three years. The outbreak in Italy is by no means ended. People have died of cholera in the streets of Naples. It is rumored that 100,000 of the wealthy citizens have fled. The disease has spread throughout Italy and our quarantine officials are exercising the utmost vigilance lest the disease should get a foothold here.

—A PARTY OF Chinese notables, including Justice Shih Ying Hsu, of the Chinese High Court; the Hon. Ch'ien Hsu, Attorney-General of Pekin; Mr. Chi Chang Shen, Mr. Wen Chang Lo and Mr. Y. T. Wang, are now on the way to the United States. They are coming to study our court system and our prisons, by command of the Emperor. They have been making an exhaustive study on similar lines in Europe.

—ONE OF THE leading journals in the Japanese capital, the Kokumin of Tokyo (the official organ of the government), in a recent issue, has this significant paragraph: "The development of Japan to a first-class power within the past fifty years is, to a great extent, attributable to the trouble taken by the missionaries who, either by establishing schools or by preaching the Gospel of Christ in the churches, have cultivated the minds of the Japanese and enhanced the standard of their morals. It is to be hoped that the missionaries will redouble their energies and zeal in promoting the welfare and happiness of the Japanese." But, of course, the sensational journals which are trying to stir up trouble with Japan, will probably belittle such a declaration, although there could be no better authority short of an imperial edict.

Flew Over the Alps

NAPOLEON with his army slowly crawled up the Alps under extreme difficulty and went down on the other side into Italy. Señor Chavez, the latest hero of the Alps, took wings and flew over them like a bird, but his world's record flight and aerial mastery of the Alps was suddenly followed by his tragic death. The young Peruvian aviator undertook to fly from Brigue in Switzerland across the Alps to Milan in Italy. After safely crossing the snowy peaks and black yawning gorges of the Simplon, he undertook to make a landing at Domodossola, to secure oil for his machine. He was descending gracefully, when, about thirty feet above the ground, a sudden gust of wind caught the monoplane, which turned over and fell, carrying Señor Chavez down with it and under it. He was taken out from the wreckage bleeding, with both legs broken, his left thigh fractured and his body fearfully bruised. He was carried to the hospital. He lived from Friday till Tuesday, when he passed away. He asked the physician, "Is there no hope for me? I do not want to die just yet." According to the physicians, Chavez in a delirium the night before he expired, said, "Still more snow, more glaciers; another towering peak ahead! O God! it's frightful! when will it end?" It is said that the $20,000 purse which was to be given to the one first flying over the Alps to Milan, was to have been presented to him for his daring heroism and success in crossing the mountains. This young man's flight and faith remind us of the youth in Longfellow's vision who passed through an Alpine village carrying a banner in his hand bearing the word "Excelsior" (higher). The warm happy homes on the way invited him to halt, the beautiful maiden besought him to tarry for her love, the wise old man warned him of the danger ahead, of the terrible storm threatening and the awful avalanche; but he heeded them not, for he was on a journey upward, higher, still higher over the greatest barriers to his goal, and the brave boy with his bounding ambition fell weary to the earth and perished in the snow:

A traveler by the faithful hound,
Half-buried in the snow was found,
Still grasping in his hand of ice
That banner with the strange device,
Excelsior!

It would seem as though Longfellow were a prophet as well as poet, having the latest hero of the Alps in his mind—the young man who took wings and flew higher and higher, till he put the Alps beneath his feet, then perished within sight of his goal. This Peruvian aviator, only twenty-three years of age, symbolizes the all-daring courage, the indomitable energy, the strength of will, the boundless ambition, and brilliant achievement of young manhood. Longfellow's youth who climbed the Alps and the hero of to-day who flew over them suggest the instinct of the universal breast demanding higher and still higher things and a life of progress that shall never end. Mastery over mountains of difficulty and wrong, progress on the path of virtue, and enjoyment of the eternal life are the heritage of those who possess the Christian faith.

For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world: and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. (I. John 5:4.)

Britain's Drink Bill Decreasing

Consul-General John L. Griffiths of London has just reported to the United States government a decided reduction in the liquor traffic in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales. In England and Wales in 1908 convictions for drunkenness aggregated 187,803, while in 1909 the total was 169,518, a decrease of 18,385, or nearly one-tenth. The decrease in Scotland outside of the towns for 1909 as compared with 1908 was nineteen per cent., and in the Scottish towns the decrease in drunkenness amounted to twenty-seven per cent., while in Ireland the decrease from 1908 was eight per cent. The decrease in drunkenness has been attributed to the increase in the price of whisky and in the organization of social clubs as a substitute for the licensed public drinking place. The chief reason is that Great Britain has caught the spirit of the times, which is a recognition of the damage of the liquor traffic and the necessity for its curtailment and abolition. While there is a hopeful reduction in the consumption of liquors in the home countries, the statistics of which were reported to our government, there is not an English speaking colony on the earth that is not fighting the rum-traffic as vigorously and almost as successfully as they are doing in our own Southland. The nations are beginning to realize the truth of the prophet's statement that Strong drink shall be bitter to them that drink it. (Isa. 24:9.)

Hobble Skirt Accident

Some young people were playing a set of lawn tennis at the Cannon Grange, near Norwalk, Conn., when one of the young lady players fell and broke her leg. The hobble skirt which she wore tripped her and she fell, receiving the injury. A woman alighting from a street car the other day clad in one of these skirts fell and fractured her skull. The most vivid imagination would be required to conceive of any occasion when a hobble skirt would be of value. Certainly the last use it could be put to would be that of promoting success at lawn tennis. There is no folly to which a blind devotion to fashion will not lead. Whether the wearing apparel be modest or immodest, beautiful or homely, graceful or awkward, custom is the law with these devotees of fashion. The vanities of life lead to so much folly and involve such liability to injury, both physical and spiritual, that those who are handicapped and hobble-skirted by them might utter the prayer of the psalmist:

Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity; and quicken thou me in thy way. (Ps. 119:37.)

George Chavez, the Aeronaut Who Flew Across the Alps
He was injured in alighting and died a few days after his triumphant flight

Risks Life for Friend

While Raymond Guilfoyle, a boy of fifteen years, was feeding an electric meat-grinder in the Diamond Market in Pittsburg, his hand was caught in the machine, which began to make mince-meat of it. Charles Lompus, aged fourteen years, jumped on a bench, and tearing down the high-volted wires at the peril of his own life, broke the circuit and stopped the machinery. Strange to say, Lompus escaped injury. The grinder had to be broken to pieces before the boy's hand could be extricated. It was not because Lompus was ignorant of the danger he incurred in touching the wires, but it was because he loved his comrade and wanted to save him. If search were made we have no doubt that it would be found that the humble boy has good blood in his veins, and that he belongs to a home with noble environment and instruction. Such heroism is not rare in this blessed country of ours! There is scarcely a calamity anywhere that has not its hero ready to offer sympathy and service. There was One who saved our lives at the peril of his own, who was not able to save himself, to whom we owe unfeigned gratitude and unceasing love. His enemies spoke of this when they said:

He saved others; himself he cannot save. (Matt. 27:42.)

Fake Investment Schemes

Mr. Warren Dickson, the new head of the Post Office Inspectors in New York City, said the other day: "In the last ten years the American people have invested $50,000,000 in fake mining schemes." He says, "Twenty-cent shares spell fake." The post office authorities declare that the circulars and other documents sent out through the mail by one man (just arrested) and his agents to induce the public to invest in a certain stock resulted in a loss to the people of $1,300,000. The government, which has tried to keep a sharp eye on such dishonesties, is more than ever determined entirely to suppress them. Avarice has such a cunning heart and greedy hand that it will take away by every conceivable device from others the smaller and larger amounts, unless there is the greatest caution and persistence in retaining them.

For riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven. (Prov. 23:5.)

Famous Missionary Hymn Omitted

The Missionary Hymnal Commission of the Protestant Episcopal Church surprised the Christian world by ordering that the famous missionary hymn "From Greenland's Icy Mountains" be eliminated from the revised hymnal. Protests in and outside of the Church from the secular and religious press are entered against this action of the committee. It would seem to the average Christian that that particular hymn would be the last to be left out of any collection of missionary hymns and ought in fact to have its place as number one. The circumstances of the composition of the hymn are these: Reginald Heber, a young Episcopalian rector in Shropshire, England, was on a visit to his father-in-law, Dr. Shipley, vicar of Wrexham, for the purpose of preaching the first of a series of missionary sermons. On Saturday afternoon Dr. Shipley, knowing that the young man had the poetic instinct, asked him to compose a missionary hymn for use at the meeting on the following night. The young man drew his chair to another part of the room, scribbled hastily for a little time, and turning to his father-in-law began to read to him:

From Greenland's icy mountains,
From India's coral strand, and continued till he had finished three stanzas, and then asked his father-in-law how they would do. The answer was, "Very well indeed." The young man said, "Wait a minute or two. I think it needs a closing stanza," which he wrote and read:

Waft, waft, ye winds, his story, and you, ye waters, roll.

This young rector became the Bishop of India. Seven years after the composition of this immortal hymn he went to his reward. For almost three generations this young man's love for God and his fellow-men and earnest desire for the salvation of the heathen have been echoed and re-echoed by the militant hosts of the Church of God. That an immortal hymn written by an Episcopalian Bishop, himself a foreign missionary, a hymn cherished by the universal Church, should be left out of the missionary collection of hymns in the Episcopal Church, is astonishing and regrettable. Whether the committee shall retain or reject the hymn in its collection, Christians of every denomination throughout the wide world will continue to sing it with the tear of love and the shout of faith for centuries to come.

Sing unto the Lord, all the earth; show forth from day to day his salvation. Declare his glory among the heathen; his marvelous works among all nations. (I. Chron. 16:23, 24.)

A LEADER IN RELIGIOUS ART

IN the death of William Holman Hunt at his London home on the 7th of August last, the world lost its greatest modern religious painter.

Indeed, it might be said that Holman Hunt originated the wonderful modern movement in religious art. In form and technique others have surpassed him; but in spontaneous and fresh conceptions of religious subjects, he has been unrivaled, and his influence may be traced in the pictures of nearly all of his contemporaries who have attempted similar themes.

Holman Hunt, as he is commonly called, was born in the heart of London in 1827. His father was a poor warehouseman, and the boy was put to work in an office at the age of twelve. But his fingers itched for the pencil and the brush, and before he had attained his majority he began to eke out a poor living by painting portraits.

At the Academy he met Millais and Rossetti. They discussed the character of modern art, and agreed that it was meretricious and untrue to the finest ideals. They resolved to band together to reform and purify it.

Thus began the astonishing Pre-Raphaelite movement, which has revolutionized the whole world of painting and sculpture.

At the age of twenty-seven, Hunt exhibited his most famous painting, "The Light of the World," representing our Saviour, with the face of a judge and a mediator, awful yet pitiful, and surrounded by many symbolical objects.

This picture has been reproduced in scores of ways, and millions of copies of it have been strewn broadcast over the world. Few other pictures are so well known.

The attitude chosen by the artist is the most characteristic and appealing that could be selected. Like all of Hunt's other pictures, it possesses to a remarkable degree the quality of impressiveness. One cannot forget it.

Among the most famous of his other works are "The Shadow of the Cross"; "The Lady of Shalott"; "The Triumph of the Innocents"; "May Morning on Magdalen Tower"; and "The Finding of Christ in the Temple."

Principal Forsyth claims Holman Hunt as "a specifically Christian artist." He adds, "Hunt's subjects lie nearer the great Death than the great Resurrection; yet his art is inspired by the spirit of the Resurrection rather than by that of the Crucifixion. He paints the Cross in the spirit of the Resurrection, whereas Rossetti would have painted the Resurrection in the spirit of the Cross."

From the famous painting by W. Holman Hunt

"The Light of the World"

All three of these devoted artists, Hunt, Millais and Rossetti (all now passed away), were largely inspired by Ruskin. They were enthusiastic, imaginative, pure-souled, and had "ecstatic dreams of color." To paint truth exactly as they saw it was their single aim. Manner was less important to them than subject and spirit.

This led to fiery criticisms from the sticklers for mechanical perfection; but amid the storm of scornful invective, the Pre-Raphaelites kept calmly on their way, for they knew that the highest power lay with them.

Holman Hunt came not to his great fame by accident. Strenuous and persistent work, attended by even more than the usual quota of defeats and failures, was his portion for many years.

Individual and solitary in his genius, a world used to different standards refused to accept him. He "harked back," as he himself expressed it, to the time of Raphael, when art was free from "the corruption, pride and disease" which honeycombed all its modern manifestations.

In his zeal for true atmosphere and environment, he visited Palestine, and became saturated with its spirit. Thus he hoped to infuse into his religious paintings the subtle glow and charm which only complete sincerity can impart. The critics coldly proclaimed that he had not caught them; but the world has made those carpers reverse their verdict. What coming ages will say, no one can tell; but for us of to-day, he stands as the ablest modern exponent on canvas of the objects of our deepest faith.

He wrote, "The inheritance that the greatest of the Sons of God has won for us has its welcome in my soul. I want to prove, so far as my painting can, that Christianity is a living faith. Perhaps, with less opportunity of knowing the real history, the Parisian sentimental travesty of the Gospel by Renan, or the romance by Strauss suiting modern intellect, would impress me with some of the respect which so many men have for them. To me their theories present far greater obstacles to faith than the original Gospels offer."

No one can measure the part which this great painter has played in the progress of our religion during his long life; but we may be sure that it was large, and may well thank our Father that he put such brilliant talents into such reverent hands.

THE FOREST FOLK OF PARAGUAY

By H. WHITTINGTON

SOME months ago, I met a number of Indians from Ipeti, a place some leagues west of our Santa Teresa Station. I had a friendly talk th them; they invited me to visit them at their me; and I promised to do so. Ever since then I ve been eager to go, but I was in the midst of ilding and clearing operations that had to be ished before I could set out.

It was only on Sunday that I was able to start on e march, accompanied by Santiago, my little dian boy, who acted as guide. Our clothes were ickly drenched as we made our way through the g dew-laden grass, but we were soon in a swamp, oughing through mud and water, and the wetting om the dew was forgotten as a trifle. Presently e arrived at a tapii (group of Indian huts) here the Indians warned us that we had better t attempt the journey to eti; the swamps, they said, d the river were impassable account of the recent heavy ins, and we should turn back once. Bidding them good-by, e were soon lost to their view the belt of forest that shut em in from the next swamp. Ten minutes brought us to e edge of the swamp. My tle boy was "vaqueno" (an pert guide). The winding th seemed familiar to him, d only once did he show any certainty. We trudged on, ile after mile, through forest, amp, and mud.

At length we came to the ep flowing waters of the ver Ipeti. Skirting its banks r a quarter of a mile or more, e reached the bridge—a fallen ee extending little more than lf way across, with a log rown out from the opposite nk, resting on one of its anches. Over this rickety ructure we passed in safety, d a short walk farther ought us to the first tapii. ne place here is called Ipeti om the river we had crossed. Our reception was not very rdial. The Indians were not a talking mood. So after a ort stay we made our way to e next tapii, a little further . We did not find so many ople here, but our reception as decidedly better.

Picture to yourself a collec- on of low palm-leaf huts idely built and barely enough shelter the human inmates om the weather, but afford- g ample refuge for colonies crawling and stinging in- sects. Refuse of all kinds litters the encampment. A number of half naked, dirty, lazy looking men are lounging about. A few are the proud possessors of shirt and trousers. Others have shirt, minus trousers, while the greater number have nothing more than the usual loin-cloth. Most of the men wear a long cord of twisted hair wound many times round the leg below the knee. The women, if not as lazylike as the men, are at any rate no cleaner. Their clothing consists mostly of a piece of dirty calico hanging from the waist in the form of a skirt. Their ornaments are simple, and consist merely of long strings of beads on neck and shoulders, and short strings for earrings. They use more paint than the men, and few of them are without streaks of black pigment on their faces. Their chief occupation seems to be carrying food from the plantation, cooking it, and eating it most of the day. An old dame can be seen sitting by a fire on the ground, busily roasting sweet potatoes, while a little girl stands beside her, fighting and killing the mbariguis (sand-flies) and other insects which have old granny's back all pricked and sore. The old woman evidently gets her own way among the younger women, and, though perhaps not all out of love, they seem willing to do her bidding. A few red-skinned children are playing in the dust and mud. The cares and weight of a dull, monotonous life have not yet crushed their spirits, and for the most part they are happy, with the little they know of happiness. Occasionally a squabble arises among them and a free fight ensues; but that is soon put an end to by the parents.

An Indian tapii is, of course, incomplete without its parrots and dogs. Here these are much in evidence. The latter seldom fail to remind one of their presence, and have an unpleasant disposition to show their teeth.

There are some thirty inhabitants in Ipeti, and there are, as already stated, hundreds of such places in the forests. What the total number of the Indians is we cannot tell, but it is evidently considerable. As yet practically nothing has been done to give them the Gospel. The Inland South American Missionary Union is the only Protestant mission at work among them, but our effort is weak for lack of support from the home church.

Before leaving Ipeti I sang a hymn to the people, but they did not show any interest—it was my first visit to them, and their interest has to be awakened. I also gave them some presents, and got a present of a good-sized pumpkin from them.

We then said good-by and turned homeward towards the river.

The footing on the crazy bridge, with the dark water covering part of it, was none too sure, but we crossed in safety. We know these children of the forest must, like ourselves, come to the great and final river, and one wonders how many of them, or if any of them, will know how and where to find the Bridge on which the footing is sure, and that reaches to the Father's home on the other side! Will you help us to tell them?

A Great Company of Missionaries Who Have Sailed for the Foreign Field

THE missionary rooms of the Baptists in Boston were the scene of a great deal of interest and activity during the early part of the week of September 19. On Tuesday, there sailed from Boston forty-one missionaries to take up the Lord's work in foreign fields. The sailing of these missionaries brings the total number of Baptist missionaries sent to foreign fields this year up to one hundred and six — or that number will have sailed before the first of next January, there being still a few to depart before that time. This is one proof of how busy the Baptists are along missionary lines. The goodly company of missionaries leaving Boston on the 20th were bound for China, Japan, the Philippines, Burma, Assam and Southern India. A few were missionaries returning to their work after a vacation in America, and the greater number were going out for the first time, not to return for at least five years, unless compelled to do so by reason of failing health. A farewell service was held in Ford Hall, and nearly a week was given up to missionary service of various kinds. J. L. H.

MOTHER BIRD'S CHILDREN'S CLUBS

Little Kitchen-Garden Maids

WE want to belong. Please may we belong to the club? The club that's up?" This is hat the children of the East Side of New York y when they are too young to read the bulletin ard of the White Door Settlement at 211 Clinton treet.

It would seem an easy matter to gather these ttle children in, and it would be if we had more om. We always plan for thirty-seven classes and ubs a week, from kindergarten, kitchen garden, sewing, city history, civics, literary and athletic clubs, comprising all ages, from boys and girls of three to the young men and women, and finally the Mothers' Club of 112 members. We always have a waiting list of boys and girls who have organized their various classes or clubs; and we could easily double the work of our eight or nine hundred if we only had more room. All summer a club of young men has held its meetings on our steps.

The kitchen garden girls registered to-day — sixty girls. They learn to sweep, to make beds, set a table, wait on the door, and do simple cooking, but we need a cooking equipment. These girls do their work well and learn much more than the text-book lessons in gentleness and courtesy.

Just a word about the boys, who, beside carrying on their literary and athletic work, are interested in being identified with the city's interests. The Lincoln Club through its vigilance in helping the Street Cleaning Department has gained for its members fifteen badges. Another boy's club wished to "help the Health Department," and called itself the "American Aid to the Society for the Prevention of Tuberculosis in New York City," and has given half the club's dues each week to send milk and eggs to a little sick boy in Mangin Street. This proved so interesting that the club branched out into other work, and helped several destitute families. The members of this club are beginning to think of others, as boys, which speaks well for the citizenship of the future.

Will the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD help us that we may go forward, and that the work, which has grown beyond all expectation in twelve years, may not be handicapped by lack of support, and that the Gospel Settlement may be conspicuously successful because its standard is so high?

"We want to belong!"

AROUND THE OPEN FIREPLACE

A Unique Diary

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ONE day, some months ago, there came to me in the morning mail a book of unusual charm and singular beauty. It is a printed, but not a published book, and as yet only a limited number of copies are to be had by fortunate readers. Since I first saw the book it has been placed in several public libraries, and a hope has been expressed that it may form part of the supplementary reading of the public schools in New York State. I have no hesitation in saying that it deserves to be widely read, because of its merit, its literary value and the simple story it tells. To thousands of homes in our land it would bring a picture of an important historic period. The book is the Diary of Caroline Cowles Richards, 1852-1872. She is now Mrs. E. C. Clarke of Naples, N. Y., a subscriber to and constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Here is the first entry in the little girl's diary:

"Canandaigua, N. Y., November 21, 1852.—I am ten years old to-day and think I will write a journal and tell who I am and what I am doing. I have lived with my Grandfather and Grandmother Beals ever since I was seven years, and Anna, too, since she was four. Our brothers, James and John, came too. Anna and I go to school at District Number 11. Mr. James C. Cross is our teacher, and some of the scholars say he is cross by name and cross by nature, but I like him. He gave me a book by the name of Noble Deeds of American Women, for reward of merit, in my reading class. To-day a nice old gentleman, by the name of Mr. William Wood, visited our school. He had a beautiful pear in his hand and said he would give it to the boy or girl who could spell "virgaloo," for that was the name of the pear. I spelt it that way, but it was not right. A little boy named William Sly spelt it right and he got the pear. I wish I had, but I can't even remember how he spelt it. If the pear was as hard as the name, I don't believe any one would want it, but I don't see how they happened to give such a hard name to such a nice pear."

This is the first childish entry. Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford, writing to me about this book, said: "The very spirit of childhood is in it," and indeed it is. The two little sisters, Caroline and Anna, were very tenderly brought up by their grandparents, people who belonged to our real American aristocracy. The glimpses given of home life under the roof of Deacon Beals, the atmosphere of consistent piety, the wholesome restraint of the day in which there was no harshness, but only perfect love and confidence, the Bible reading of the little girls, and the simple, beautiful manner of their upbringing are page by page unconsciously revealed. I could not put the book down after it came into my hands. When Caroline Richards was a young girl the storm of the Civil War gathered and broke over our land. To those who remember that period, the story of life in Canandaigua is of thrilling interest. The little book is adorned by many portraits, among them some of men and women who wrought nobly for the country in their day and generation. Fun ripples through the unpretending story. Little touches indicate changes in prevailing fashions. When Caroline Richards, as a young lady, paid a visit to New York she wrote home: "People do not pour their tea or coffee into their saucers any more to cool it, but drink it from the cup, and you must mind and not leave your teaspoon in your cup."

Apropos of this there must be among the readers of this page some careful housewives who have preserved ancient sets of china in which a tiny plate was furnished on which to set the cup when the tea was poured into the saucer. Also there may be others who studied as I did in early childhood a little schoolbook entitled Swift's Natural Philosophy. One of the questions was to this effect: "Why is hot tea poured into a saucer in order to cool it?" The answer was that by exposing a larger surface to the air evaporation will more quickly take place, or something of the sort. To quote from this diary in the space I have at command is impossible. I hope that before long it may be published. It has the unique quality of appealing to old and young alike, just as Rebecca does in Sunnybrook Farm. A few weeks ago it passed from hand to hand in a mountain inn where I was sojourning, and every reader found in it something new to praise. As Mrs. E. C. Clarke has long belonged to our CHRISTIAN HERALD family any one who wishes to know more about the diary may address her directly. Her husband is a veteran of the Civil War and a Commander in the Grand Army of the Republic. They have long dwelt together, and their children and grandchildren are still an unbroken circle.

Foolish Modes of Dress

There is apparently no end to absurdities in women's dress. Witness the extremely narrow and unbecoming skirt in vogue in certain places at the moment. A woman actually died in Paris t other day because when a panic occurred in a cro her hobble skirt prevented her from running w freedom and she tripped and fell under the hoofs a runaway horse. This special garment is so u becoming and inelegant that its reign will probal be short.

The hats of the period show no sign of dimir tion in size. Some of them look like inverted peac baskets loaded with flowers and feathers. adoring husband said not long ago that he d approved of large hats, but added: "So long as th continue to be worn I want my wife to have t biggest hat and the longest feather of any wom in church." For many years I have been a vocating the abandonment of such very lar hats in places of worship. Sever years ago a clergyman in Newa N. J., asked the women of his cong gation, as a special favor to himse to remove their hats during servi The majority cordially acceded to l wish, with the gratifying result th the preacher saw bright responsi faces in front of him instead of wa ing plumes and artificial flowers, wh those in the pews had the pleasure looking into the pastor's face, inste of into a row of hats in front of the In places of amusement it is becomi customary for women to check the hats before taking their seats, but th custom would not seem altogeth suitable in church. Why should we n as it is embarrassing to remove ha in the pew, and as they would se ously interfere with responsive rea ing, rising during hymns and the lik in the order of service, adopt a qui unobtrusive hat for use on Sunda It might be a small toque or sailor h simply trimmed for the young girl and for their elders a close fittir little bonnet copied from an old Pu tan picture. Women were just beautiful when they wore small ha as they are in this day of inconvenie and exaggerated headgear. The se vice in church would do most of more good than it does, if we were n often irritated to exasperation by th wall of hats or the serried ranks flowers and feathers which are pos tively all we can see as we sit in ou pews.

Another Golden Wedding

Two of our friend Mr. and Mrs. Jame H. Dewey, living i Orange, N. J., celebrated their fiftiet wedding anniversary on September The reception was attended by thei children, grandchildren and intimat friends. Mrs. Dewey has long bee an invalid, bearing with patient sweet ness many days of pain. The hom life of this devoted couple has been a idyl. During the evening a poem i honor of the bride and groom, writte by their niece, Miss Jeannette B. Old field, was read. We have room only for part of it

O golden sunshine, warm and bright,
Send down thy golden ray,
And fill the earth with golden light,
On this September day.

O fields, put on your fairest dress,
Your gown of golden-rod,
And cover every clod of earth,
Yes, make it golden sod.

O harvest moon, great disk of gold,
And stars and heavenly blue,
O wondrous sovereigns of the night
Lend me your beauty too.

Why do I ask all this array?
Why all this golden light?
This is our loved ones' wedding day,
And naught's too fair and bright.

The Thwarting of the Evil Eye

A TALE OF INDIA, BY W. T. ELMORE

THE sun was getting high and the shade of the margosa tree was scanty. Beneath it sat about wenty brown children with their eacher. The smallest ones were writ-ng their letters in the sand, and the ext in size were studying aloud from humb-worn books, while the "Third tandard" children were reciting to he teacher, near the trunk of the tree.

"Teacher, why can't we have a choolhouse?" asked one of the children uddenly. He was a bright-eyed, antily dressed boy of about ten, amed Nursayya. Discipline is not xacting in the village schools of In-ia, and so the teacher stopped to nswer the unusual question.

"Well, Nursayya, I surely wish we ad one," he replied. "It is hard nough at the best to keep a village chool together and much harder with-ut a schoolhouse. But I fear we shall ave to wait a while."

"What for?" asked Nursayya.

"Money, of course. We ought to ave at least sixty rupees to build a hoolhouse large enough for this vil-ge, and even then I think it would ardly hold the people at the Sunday ervices. Your parents think they are retty well loaded up in supporting e, and the missionary says he doubts he can give even the istomary ten rupees."

"Whew! Sixty rupees a lot," said Nursayya, nd they continued the sson.

School soon closed for e long noon recess and e children went away herd the goats and to lp their parents in her ways. Presently ursayya spoke again.

"Sixty rupees, my! nat's as much as an ox sts. I'm afraid we on't get a schoolhouse ry soon."

"We might begin any-ay," spoke up Sunto-em, a little girl. "Let's t all of the children to ing a little grain every y."

"Let's," said Nur-yya, his eyes begin-ng to dance. They uld hardly wait to get me and tell the others. eir enthusiasm was catching, and on every child in the village had ions of a fine two-beam schoolhouse th whitewashed walls, a thatched of, and well sanded floor. The cher heard of what was going on, t he did not disturb their plans.

There was much suppressed excite-nt the next morning when the chil-en gathered. When the roll was led each one came forward and m his poor clothing poured a pitiful adful of grain upon a cloth under e tree.

"Well, well, what is this for?" asked e teacher. "To-day isn't Sunday."

"For a schoolhouse," shouted the ldren. Altogether they had brought a little more than a quart. The cher knew the value of the cheap ain—all Indians do. He made a ick calculation. If they continued bring this much every day, which s very doubtful, it would take three y rs to build the schoolhouse. But h was greatly pleased with the inter-e and enthusiasm of the children n ertheless, and entered heartily into t ir plans.

The grain lay by the tree and school b an. After lustily singing a hymn, a l reading a Scripture lesson, fol-l ed by a prayer, the children began fi t on their Bible lesson and then t ned to the other studies. Presently a alf came walking in among the cl dren, which was nothing unusual, b this time something unusual o rred. It began to eat the little p of grain. With a shriek the chil-d n drove it away, but not until more than half of the grain was in its mouth.

"Never mind," said the teacher as some of the children began to cry in disappointment. "We will bring a bag to put the grain in after this and then it will be safe."

The little incident had set Suntoshem to thinking. "Sixty rupees, the price of an ox," Nursayya had said. If they could only get a calf and let that eat the grain, wouldn't that be the best way?"

But who would give a calf? Children in any land are not easily discouraged, and sometimes their faith and assurance work wonders. The next morning as the children were gathering, a tumult of excitement was raised as Nursayya and Suntoshem came leading a white calf, and shouted out, "Here is some more collection for the schoolhouse."

"Where did you get it?" asked teacher and children together.

"Headman Kalappayya gave him to us. At first he only laughed, but when we told him all our plan, he let us have him, and we are to give him one-fourth of what we sell him for."

A Native Congregation in One of the Interior Villages of India

"And what is your plan?" asked the teacher.

"Why, to feed him the grain, and get grass for him, and sell him and build a schoolhouse," said Suntoshem breathlessly.

Studying went poorly that morning. School was adjourned for an hour or more, while plans were laid and relaid even to the paper ornaments and the exercises on the day of opening the new schoolhouse. The practical plans, however, resulted in the appointing of children to grind the grain by turns for the calf, while others were to be responsible for bringing grass, for in southern India there is but little grazing, and the women cut the short grass beside the roads or wherever they can find it and bring it in baskets for the cattle. The calf was to be tied under the teacher's low veranda at night and come to the school in the daytime.

The teacher was tactful, and as the days went on the task of caring for the calf was made a reward for attendance and efficiency. Every village man and woman is a lover of cattle from infancy, and the plan worked admirably.

It was an interesting sight that met the missionary on his next visit to the village—a full attendance at school, and lying untied near the tree was a beautiful white calf, seemingly as much at home as any of the children.

"Bring him to the cattle show next February," he said, "and I believe you will win a prize, and so will not have to wait so long for the schoolhouse." And the children had a new incentive.

He surely was the finest calf in the village. The children brought him grain, stinting themselves, for their food was the same coarse grain. They got up early and went far to get the best grass, and the calf lived in luxury.

But prosperity is sometimes the forerunner of adversity. A so-called holy man came through the village one day shortly before the fair, begging and telling fortunes. His covetous eyes rested on the beautiful calf.

"Whose is that?" he asked, and the children told him all about it.

"There is an evil eye resting on it," he said. "The demon in the tree you have your school under is going to bring evil on the calf and on you all, for he hates the Christians. Give me five rupees and I can say a mantram to protect it and you, or else look out! Trouble is coming. I suppose you know a cow was killed by a leopard last night near the well."

The children ran frightened to the teacher, and told him what had been said to them. He came slowly out of his house and met the holy man.

"There is no demon in the tree. The demon is in you. We are Christians and do not fear the evil eye," he said boldly.

The holy man cursed him and went on, and the children began to cry with fear.

"Don't be afraid," said the teacher comfortingly. "Isn't God more powerful than that wicked man?" But the children were frightened, and all day would not let their beautiful calf get out of their sight.

It was the second night after this that the teacher suddenly awakened and looked around as though some one were present. He was sleeping on a rope cot under his veranda with the calf tied at the other end. He saw no one.

He looked for the calf. It was gone! He leaped to his feet, his brain in a whirl. "Was God going to let that evil man prevail?" His wits returned at once and he ran first to the house of old Malliah, the only man in the village who had a gun. It was an old flintlock, but in former days it had done good service in Malliah's hands.

"Come! The leopard!" he whispered so as not to rouse the others, while he shook the sleeping old man. Malliah was on his feet in an instant, and quickly took the old gun which he had kept heavily loaded since the report had come that a leopard was around. They quickly ran to the edge of the village. Would they be in time? The beautiful tropical moon made it almost as light as day. Nothing could be seen except the fields of quiet grain and out in the centre the irrigation well, where the oxen drew water daily in great leather buckets up over a pulley. They watched and listened. Presently they heard a low bellow. They looked in that direction and saw the grain moving as though some one were running away.

"There he goes! There he goes!" said the teacher. "Come on!" and he started on a run.

"That's a man, not a calf," said Malliah, but he followed as fast as he could. They had scarcely gone twenty steps before the low plaintive bellow was changed into one of wild fright, and in the moonlight they saw the calf go leaping through the grain. He had smelled the leopard, and had broken the rope with which the holy man had tied him.

"Oh, too late, too late! Shoot and scare the leopard before it leaps," cried the teacher.

Malliah raised his gun hesitatingly, for no hunter likes to fire into the air. But before he could get the gun to his shoulder the calf had disappeared. He had run towards the open ground around the well and in his fright had cleared the low wall, and fallen twenty feet to the bottom of the well.

"Oh, he'll be drowned!" cried the teacher, and started toward the well.

"Wait," commanded Malliah in a low voice, putting a restraining hand on the teacher's shoulder. "The well was drawn dry at sunset, and the bottom is soft. The calf won't be killed." As he spoke the calf again found its voice and began to call frightfully from the bottom of the well.

"Good, good!" they both whispered, but the teacher would have been disgusted if he had known that Malliah was thinking only of the leopard. Malliah now took the lead, and they crept slowly along.

"Good, the wind is toward us," whispered Malliah. They crept nearer and waited, the teacher hardly able to keep from rushing to the well. "Look," whispered Malliah. A huge form was creeping out of the grain into the open moonlight by the well.

"Shoot! Shoot!" whispered the teacher. "It will jump into the well. Shoot and scare it away." He clutched Malliah's arm. The leopard slowly crept nearer, sniffed the wall around the well, placed its fore feet on the wall and peered down into the well.

"Oh, why won't he shoot?" thought the teacher. "He hasn't one chance in a thousand to do more than scare it anyway in the night."

"Bang!" echoed and re-echoed the old gun. The leopard sprang into the air and fell backwards. Old Malliah was above him in an instant, but the bullet had done its work. In a moment the teacher was climbing down the sloping sides of the well, and scrambling towards the muddy, frightened calf. The people came pouring out of the village, aroused by the gun. Away on the other side of the field the holy man slunk away into the night.

There was but little sleeping in the village that night. The calf was taken up out of the well, washed, petted, hugged, and wept over by the children. The men dragged the leopard in triumph to the edge of the village, where it was skinned amid shouts of rejoicing that their enemy had fallen and there would not soon be danger again to their flocks.

It was a triumphant procession which came a week later to the taluq town, or county seat, where the fair was being held and where the missionary lived. There was old Malliah leading, carrying the leopard skin, walking as he used to in the days of his former prowess. Then came Nursayya and the other boys, leading a beautiful white yearling calf, which had its neck fairly loaded with garlands. Then there was the teacher and Suntoshem, and the girls of the school, and behind came many of the villagers, led by Kalappayya, the headman, who seemed to be proud to be walking among the Christians.

The calf was soon tied in its place in the fair and some of the boys stationed to care for it. Presently Nursayya returned with some other boys from a tour of inspection. Their faces were anxious.

"Oh, I am afraid we haven't any chance," said Nursayya to the teacher and the others. "I never supposed there were such beautiful cattle in the world. Just look at that cow yonder and those magnificent oxen over there. Why, they say the Bobbili Rajah sent those buffaloes that are up there near the fence. They look like elephants, and a man told me they take the first prize everywhere. Oh, my! I'm afraid we are done for," and he rubbed the calf's back ruefully. "Why, they say there are men here from South Africa and South America and the Philippines to buy cattle to take to those lands."

"You must remember," said the teacher, "that our calf doesn't have to compete with any of those fine cattle. He is only in the yearling class, so don't give up too soon."

It was an anxious time next day when a string of yearlings stood before the judges. Nursayya was holding the children's calf. He surely did look fine, but the others were good too.

"First prize for yearlings," announced the judges, and the man started with the blue ribbon. Down the line he went. The children held their breath. "Oh," they groaned, "he is going by," and surely enough he was.

"Here," called the chairman of the judges, "that's the one we meant, the one the boy is holding," and he pointed towards Nursayya. The man turned to tie on the ribbon, but he was almost swept off his feet by an avalanche of children who, forgetting all rules, rushed into the ring, yelling and hugging the calf, which seemed to enjoy his attentions.

"And now what will you take for him?" asked a buyer a little later.

"We didn't bring him to sell," answered Nursayya. "We are going to keep him, and—and when he grows up build a schoolhouse."

The missionary who was standing near smiled, but he said: "Remember, Nursayya, that your calf has won fifteen rupees as a prize, so you won't have to wait so long for the schoolhouse. Let us see what you are offered for him."

The children looked downcast. Much as they wanted the schoolhouse, to let their pet go seemed almost too much of a price. But the missionary did not notice, and turning to the buyer asked him what he would offer. "Twenty rupees," replied the man. "Twenty-five," called another. "Thirty," said the first. And here they stopped.

"That wouldn't be enough anyway," said Nursayya with evident relief.

"For what?" said old Malliah, who had just come up.

"For the schoolhouse," replied the teacher. "We are offered thirty rupees for the calf, one-fourth of which goes to Headman Kalappayya, and the prize amounts to fifteen rupees."

Malliah's eyes were shining. "Here," he said, "are ten rupees that I just received for the leopard skin. I planned to give it from the first."

"We're pretty near to it now," the teacher. "Let us see if any will raise the bid." But there was response from the children.

"Thirty-five," bid another who been looking the calf over, and sayya looked still more miserable.

Headman Kalappayya had standing near all the time. "I th we need this calf in our village," said presently. "I will give f rupees."

"And take him home again?" children gasped.

"Yes, you must take him home me," said Kalappayya.

They called the missionary and down on the ground to count out money.

"Ten rupees goes to you anyw" said the teacher.

"No, I want to do something, and," he added lower, "I hope th may soon be one to meet with yo one of the worshipers in the schoolhouse."

The missionary grasped his h but said nothing.

"But it will be best for you to t the ten rupees," said the teacher. "Y" agreed the missionary. "It will better for the children, and you help in some other way."

"All right; I'll give a chair table when the house is built," he plied.

"Fifty-five rupees," announced teacher to the children and villag "That doesn't lack much of it."

"And now I have something to t" said the missionary. "The last h mail brought me five dollars fro junior society to help some vill school. That amounts to fifteen pees. I think you have earned it, turn it over for your schoolhouse."

"Seventy rupees! Hurrah, hurra" shouted the children. "We'll have finest schoolhouse in the district."

"Now what about the evil ey" asked the teacher.

Compensation for Accidents

THE world is watching with deep interest the uses made of the great fund donated by Mrs. Sage for social betterment. The prosecution of investigations regarding the lives and the limitations of the so-called working class, to which no small part of the income of the fund has so far been devoted, commends itself to the general intelligence. This latest issue in the series recording the results of the Sage Foundation studies, is in some respects the most important of all.

The editor reminds us in his preface that the Slavs, Latins, Germans and Britons who crowd the vast manufactories and foundries of Pittsburg, and who are typical of their class all over the United States, have come from regions of law and order, so far as the hazards of industry are concerned. They find themselves here plunged into a region of anarchy regarding those hazards.

This is the first systematic investigation of all cases of work-injuries occurring during a representative period in a representative American district, and the facts presented are therefore invaluable to the student of social and industrial conditions. But even as this record appears, an improvement in the legal status of sufferers from such accidents is apparent all over our country. Owing somewhat, no doubt, to the earlier issues of this great series, the attention of employers and of the public has been called to the shameful lack of protection against such accidents and their consequence. The United States Steel Corporation has voluntarily assumed a certain care of men disabled in its service, and of their families. State commissions have been appointed to look into the matter in Minnesota, Wisconsin and New York; and many private associations have been formed for similar purposes.

During the year 1906-7, 526 men were killed by work accidents in Allegheny County, Pa., while its hospitals received 509 men injured in such accidents. The scope of this inquiry and others like it; and the consequences which should result from them, are therefore seen to be momentous. Responsibility should be definitely fixed, and those to blame should be punished. Books like this one must help effectively to these ends.

Bowery Mission Trophies

The Tramp

CHRISTMAS was approaching. In a cosy little parlor, behind a book-seller's store, in one of the numerous outlying boroughs that constitute the greater portion of the vast British metropolis, sat an aged couple. Quite a picture they made, these two, with the ruddy fire light reflected on their placive faces and on their venerable heads, where the snows of winter had gathered thick and fast.

Two alert and nimble daughters moved noiselessly around the room, decorating with red-berried hollies the pictures on the wall, the chandeliers, and the ornaments on the mantel piece. The Christmas spirit was in the air. Outside, the jingle of the sleigh-bells could be heard, and the murmur of happy voices, as their owners trudged home laden with Christmas commodities. Yet a shadow lay upon the faces of the aged pair.

"I wonder where John is," said the old man. "What a happy Christmas it would be if he were here. Two years have passed since we heard from him. Can it be that he is dead?"

"Oh, no, father," replied his wife, "let us have faith in God. He knows where the boy is. He will take care of him, and bring him back to us. We have done all that was possible to find him, communicating with all our friends, advertising in English and American newspapers; we can do no more. Let us wait in patience for God's answer to our prayers."

The letter carrier's whistle rang out on the frosty winter air. Then came the hurried rat-a-tat on the door knocker. One of the girls flew to answer it, and came back with a shining face and a letter in her hand—a letter from John. The prayer was answered.

John Boyne came into the Bowery Mission on Sunday morning, December, a forlorn and desolate tramp. How the germ of the wanderlust had entered his system was a mystery, but somehow or other it had obtained a lodgment, and had developed with alarming rapidity. Coming to this country and not immediately finding colonial work, he joined the great army of wanderers who roam from State to State in aimless vagabondage. Walking on dusty highways, or on railroad ties, riding in freight-cars, creeping into barns and hen-coops for needed sleep, calling at the back doors of farm houses for "handouts"—this was the life he lived for several years. After an upright and industrious Christian life of half a dozen years, he used to tell us that, as the spring time of the year came round, he would often grow unaccountably restless, and the old fascination of the tramp life would come powerfully upon him, and oblige him to call earnestly upon God for power to resist it.

When he entered the Mission he had eight cents in his pocket. He had paid for the coming night's bed in the Phœnix Lodging House, which stood next door to old "Number Fifty-five"; beyond that he had no provision, and no plan of life. He had endeavored to school himself into forgetfulness of God, his soul, home, and all other good and beautiful things he had known, and he had partially succeeded.

His life, however, was destined, on this cold bleak December Sunday, to undergo a sudden and remarkable change. The prayers of the "old folk at home" were due to receive an answer.

"Mother" Bird was leading the meeting. Four or five hundred other men, mostly tramps and ne'er-do-wells like himself, were present. To his great astonishment he found himself thinking, thinking hard, about things which had been almost obliterated from his memory. Scenes of his far-off boyhood days, with visions of his father, mother, sisters, and home, passed in rapid succession before him. Suddenly he found himself listening to a strangely pathetic voice. He was too far away to see clearly the face of the speaker, but it was a wonderful story he heard. It was Ed. Chambers, who in after years became the Damon to John Boyne's Pythias, and who was telling how, twelve months ago, he was delivered from just such an aimless life as he himself was living. Involuntarily, almost, he began to pray. When the meeting concluded, his head was still bowed in prayer when a gentle hand was laid on his shoulder. It was "Mother" Bird. She sat down beside him and spoke to him in tender and heart-touching tones. "It seemed to him like his mother's voice." What a relief it was to unburden himself to one of whose sympathy he instantly and instinctively felt assured. "Mother" Bird has led hundreds of such men to Christ; so, with infinite patience and tact, she elicited his story, and his declaration that from that day he would live a Christian life.

His first duty was to write home and tell his people what had happened. The purchase of a five-cent stamp reduced his available capital to three cents, but the letter having been written and mailed, he started out on Monday morning with a light heart and clear conscience, to fight the strenuous battle for a renewed manhood. Thousands of Bowery men who have watched him through his ten years' struggle know how splendidly he has fought, and how nobly he has won.

Two and a half years after the memorable Sunday of John's conversion, my wife and I sat in the same comfortable little parlor behind the book-seller's store in Bayswater, London. The venerable parents sat on either side of us, the sisters and an elder brother being also present. It would be impossible to describe how our hearts glowed within us as we related the story of his conversion, and described to them the devoted and helpful life he was living amongst his poor Bowery brethren. Tears of joy rolled down the cheeks of the aged father, whilst in the mother's eyes there was a radiant light "that was never seen on land or sea," the light of an ineffable and unspeakable joy.

For a man who had just emerged from the realm of trampdom, it was no easy task that lay before this truly converted boy. But for the unfailing grace of God, over and over again, he would have fallen beneath the weight of the cross. And yet from the time he went out, with three cents in his pocket, to live the straight life, he declares he "has never been without a place to sleep, never gone without a meal, or decent clothes to wear."

His first job was the carrying of a tradesman's banner in the bitter, piercing winter weather, for a dollar a day, which munificent sum was, on the pretext of business stringency, reduced to five dollars per week. Then the successive rounds of the social and industrial ladder on which he rose were positions as elevator man, assistant school janitor, farm hand, and finally as an assistant in the commissary department of the Florida East Coast Railroad, where he is at present engaged.

Although of an extremely retiring and humble disposition, so quiet as to secure for himself the name of "Silent John," no man who was ever engaged in Bowery Mission work has rendered better service, or gained more securely the respect of his brethren than this quondam tramp.

$11,347.13 on the Side.

Mr. F. H. Dunlap of West Salisbury, N. H., in the past twenty-two years has cleared $11,347.13 from hens. This is a remarkable record, when it is known that Mr. Dunlap is employed ten hours a day in a store and all the time he has to put in with his hens is what he can get morning, noon and night. This $11,347.13 was all made on the side. Nor does Mr. Dunlap get fancy prices for what he has to sell. He ships to Boston, and takes current quotations from the commission men there. Mr. Dunlap began in 1887 with twenty hens. Last year his poultry profits figured out $853.69—and this is all on the side. Mr. Dunlap's hens have bought him a beautiful home, purchased a horse and carriage, are sending three boys to school and college, besides giving something for a rainy day. Can others do equally as well? "Sure thing," says Mr. Dunlap, "if they will wear out the soles of their shoes faster than they do the seat of their pants." The story of Mr. Dunlap's success and his methods is told in the book, "$2.00 a Day from Poultry and Eggs!" and it is only one out of a score of things to set the blood tingling and make one resolve to get next to the $600,000,000 spent in the United States each year for poultry and eggs.

$2.00 a Day from Poultry and Eggs

Is the name of a new book by the author of "200 Eggs a Year Per Hen," the most popular poultry book ever printed. "2.00 a Day from Poultry and Eggs" deals with the business side of poultry keeping as the other dealt with egg production. It tells how to make poultry keeping pay. It describes the methods by which O. P. Barton of Seabrook, N. H., cleared $734.39 from 90 pullets in 1907; tells how F. H. Dunlap of West Salisbury, N. H., makes $1000 a year from eggs, devoting not over two hours a day to his hens; how a motorman, at $16.28 a week, built up a business at $10,000 a year; how the author earned $928.73 the first year he went on his farm. Not a detail left out.

The book tells how to make a start, what breeds pay, how, when and where to buy a farm, how to make a living from the first, describes the most wonderful brooding system in the world, tells how to build the most economical poultry houses, how to feed for best results, describes a feed that can be made for 15 cents a bushel and is without a peer for producing eggs, how to make money with pigeons, how to buy and sell to advantage, how to pick out the laying hens, how to put down eggs so that they will keep a year, etc.

Invaluable to every man who wishes to make money on the side, and indispensable to the man who is looking forward to the free, independent, healthful life of the poultry farm. Ninety-six pages; illustrated. Price 50 Cents, or with the American Poultry Advocate one year 75 cents, two years' subscription and book for $1.00, or given as a premium for two yearly subscriptions at 50 cents each. Our paper is handsomely illustrated, 44 to 92 pages, 50 cents per year. 3 months' trial, 10 cts. Sample free. Catalogue of poultry books free.

What We Have Learned*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

ON July 17 we learned about Jesus Christ as the Son of the Living God. The apostle Peter called him so when Jesus asked, "Who do men say that the Son of man is?" That question must be answered by everybody who is born into the world. Where we shall spend eternity depends upon the way we answer it. Let us answer it as Peter did. And let us live every day as if we believed that Jesus is the Son of the Living God, and as such is entitled to our love and loyalty, because in every incident of life he is our friend and helper. Some one has put it this way: "Am I wounded? He is balm. Am I sick? He is medicine. Am I naked? He is clothing. Am I poor? He is wealth. Am I hungry? He is bread. Am I thirsty? He is water. Am I in debt? He is surety. Am I in darkness? He is a sun. How can I build my character? He is a rock. Must I face a black and gathering storm of trouble? He is an anchor, sure and steadfast. Am I to be tried? He is an advocate. Is sentence passed and am I condemned? He is pardon." He could not be so much to me, if he were not the Son of God. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life." And not only is he my Saviour, but he is the Saviour of "whosoever," and in him we are all builded together as the Church of God. His Saviourship and Sonship is the rock on which the Church is built. Wherever any body of people is found who will not acknowledge him as the Son of the Living God and the Saviour of mankind, they have no right to call themselves a church, according to the interpretation of Christ himself.

The Glorified Christ

On July 24 we studied about the glorified Christ: "His face did shine as the sun, and his garments became white as the light." At the time he was standing upon the snow on the top of Mount Hermon. His garments were as white as the snow if not whiter. "No fuller on earth could whiten them." Five persons were spectators of his transfiguration—two saints from glory, Moses and Elijah—and three mortal men, Peter, James and John. "Nothing shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." "Neither life nor death." Moses had passed from earth nearly fifteen hundred years before, when he died in the land of Moab, and God buried him, and "no man knoweth of his sepulchre until this day." Elijah had passed from earth nearly eight hundred years before, and yet both Moses and Elijah came at the summons of Jesus. They came and talked with him and he with them about the end for which he had come into the world, even his death for sinners which should be accomplished at Jerusalem. And to the three men, the occasion seemed so grand that they fell on their faces from fear, and then it seemed so blessed that they did not want to leave the place, but asked Jesus to let them build three tents, or tabernacles, of leaves, that they might dwell together on the mountain top for a few days at least.

> His countenance is light,
> Even to the darkest night.
> That love shall never change,
> That light shall ne'er grow dim;
> Change thou thy faithless heart
> To find its all in him.

Jesus did not permit his disciples to build the tabernacles they desired, but instead, he led them down the mountain, where he healed the demoniac boy. Thus he showed that fellowship with him must consist in work rather than rapture. What we sometimes hear called "the joy of doing good" is finding our "all in him."

On July 31 we studied a lesson on forgiveness. Peter was in doubt how many times he ought to forgive any one. He thought "seven times" the limit; but Jesus said, "until seventy times seven." And then as a reason why forgiving should be practically limitless Jesus spoke a parable about a servant who would not forgive his fellow-servant, a small debt, when he himself had been forgiven a much larger debt. And for this unmerciful treatment, "he was delivered to the tormentors till he should pay all that was due," that is, he was imprisoned. If we have an unforgiving spirit towards others, let us not presume to pray to God to forgive us our debts. Some have even dared to say, omitting "as we forgive others." But that does not release any one from the obligation to forgive others, neither can God's unconditional forgiveness be secured in that manner. Here are the precepts of Jesus in regard to forgiving others:

> Forgive seventy times seven.
> Love one another even as I have loved you.
> Be ye kind one to another.
> Avenge not yourselves.
> First cast the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.
> Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.
> Love thy neighbor as thyself.

If we learn these sayings of Jesus by heart, we shall never need to be in doubt whom to forgive, and how many times to forgive.

A mother said to her little boy, "Didn't I see you writing on your slate yesterday?" "Yes," he said. "I will show it to me." He brought the slate to his mother, and there was nothing on it, and she asked, "Where is what you wrote?" "I rubbed it out," the boy replied. "Well, where is it?" the mother persisted. "Why, mother, I don't know." "But how could you put it away if it really was there?" "Oh, mother, I don't know. I know it was there, and it is gone." "Why," she said, "that is what God must when he said, 'I will blot out thy transgressions.'"

If we forgive others as God forgives us, we shall never say: "I can forgive, but I cannot forget." There is no forgiveness in the one who says that.

On August 7 we had a beautiful lesson about the children. The children of Nazareth are still singing about what Jesus did that day. Here is a part of their song:

> We are little Nazareth children,
> And our Father placed our home
> Mid the olive trees and vineyards
> Where, as child, he used to roam.
> For the Lord who loves the children,
> And was glad to hear their praise,
> Cares that Nazareth children know him
> Do his will and choose his ways.
> And we know that he is coming,
> Every knee to him shall bow:
> And the joyous shouts to greet him
> Shall begin in Nazareth now.

We heard this song sung in Nazareth.

On that same day when Jesus blessed the children, a rich young man came to him and asked what he should do to gain eternal life. Jesus saw that the young man's love of riches had the first place in his heart, and so he told him to go and sell all that he had, and give it to the poor, and then come and be his follower. But the young man went away from Jesus, and we are not told that he came back again. Then Jesus made the people understand how hard it was for a rich man to get to

* The International Sunday School Lesson for October 23, 1910. The Quarterly Review. GOLDEN TEXT: "And it came to pass, when the time was come that he should be received up, he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem, and sent messengers before his face." Luke 9:51.

heaven by comparing him with a camel that could not get through the narrow gate in the wall unless all of the load should be taken off. The love of riches is the load which must be taken off by any one who seeks to enter heaven. Let us not make the mistake of thinking that riches are in themselves bad—it is only the love of riches that Jesus condemned.

On August 14, we had a lesson about Jesus' parable concerning the laborers in the vineyard.

Workers in the Vineyard

Jesus told about a man who went out early in the morning to hire laborers to work in his vineyard. A day's wages was a penny, the denarius, which about fifteen cents. It is translated "shilling" in the Revised Version, which is nearer being correct. Some men went to work in the vineyard at nine o'clock in the morning, others were found who went to work at twelve o'clock, and others still who did not go to work until three o'clock in the afternoon, and yet at the end of the day they all were paid the same amount. That seemed unfair to the laborers who had worked the longest. It all depends on which way one looks at it: is it money or opportunity you desire?

On August 21, we had the story of Jesus opening the eyes of the two blind beggars, as he was passing through Jericho on his way to Jerusalem. Jesus did not come from heaven to heal the bodies of men, but their souls, but he was the greatest physician that ever wore earth about him. It was his delight to make the lame to walk, the blind to see, to cleanse the lepers, to cure the palsied, and even to raise the dead to life.

On August 28, we had the lesson about Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem, riding in kingly fashion upon an ass. Loud were the acclaims of the people as they thronged about him, spreading their garments in the way, and tearing off palm branches that they might wave them to do him honor. And when the procession reached the temple, the children of the temple choir joined in the hosannas. But there were evil notes sounded; the murmurings of the Pharisees, who could not endure to see Jesus honored by anyone. Jesus did not silence the children, but he did silence the Pharisees by quoting what King David had said about the quality of children's prayers—that it is "perfected."

On September 4, we had a lesson on Jesus' two parables of judgment; both parables were about vineyards. The first one was about a man who had two sons, whom he told to go to work in his vineyard. The first one said: "I will not." The second son said: "I go, sir," but he went not. This parable Jesus spoke to the Pharisees and Sadducees that he might show them how disobedient they were to their heavenly Father. They were like the first son because they would not listen to the teaching of his Son, although God had spoken from heaven, "Hear ye him."

The vineyard of the second parable had a winepress in it. The owner let it out to a man, and himself went to a far country. When the season of grapes drew near he sent his servants to get his rent in the form of grapes, but his servants were stoned and beaten to death. Again the owner sent some of his servants, but they were treated as the others had been; then he sent his son. They took him and cast him out of the vineyard and killed him! Why did Jesus need to speak such a parable as this? Because though the people of Israel were God's vineyard, yet there were some wicked rulers among them who were quite determined that the hearts of the people should be turned away from serving the true and living God, and so the prophets and teachers whom God sent were dealt harshly with, some being put into prison or stoned and others being put to death. These same rulers, or some just like them, now had it in their hearts to kill God's only Son.

The Lesson of the Marriage Feast

On September 11, we had a lesson about the king's marriage feast for his son. This was also a parable spoken by Jesus. The king sent out his servants and invited many guests, but they declined to come. Then the king sent out his servants to invite other guests. But these behaved worse than the first who were invited, for they killed some of the servants, and then went on with their work on their farms or in their stores. They had no regrets to send to the king who had invited them. They slighted his invitation in the worst possible way. Then the king sent other servants out to invite anybody they should see on the streets, no matter how poor and miserable they were, to come to the wedding feast. At last many came, and the king had provided a beautiful coat for each one to wear at the feast. But one man would not put on the wedding garment. When the king saw him, he had him bound hand and foot and cast out of the house. Jesus spoke the parable about the wedding feast because he wanted the people all to know that they were invited to the marriage supper in heaven by and by. Already some of the Jews had said they would not come. Their reason for saying so was they did not love Jesus. Others among the Jews were so busy with their own affairs they did not care about the affairs of God.

Advertising Advances Civilization

It is generally agreed that there have come to be very few distinguishing marks between the refinement of the resident of the city and that of the resident of the country. The word "hayseed" is very seldom used in referring to a resident of the back country district, however remote it may be, because the city-bred person has long since learned that the resident of the rural district enjoys almost as many advantages as the resident of the city.

This is due in large part to modern advertising, which has called to the attention of the ruralite all sorts of commodities which formerly were enjoyed exclusively by the city resident. Years ago the resident of the country district was compelled to buy all of his wearing apparel and other commodities from the local storekeeper, who may have had many of these commodities in stock for years. But nowadays any one may take advantage of the offers made in the advertising columns of our newspapers and magazines, and thus feel that he or she is up-to-date. And in the same manner the local storekeeper, being placed in direct competition with the advertiser, is impelled to carry a stock of commodities quite as new as those which are offered through the medium of the advertisement.

In this way at least, advertising has contributed greatly to the advance of our modern civilization.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

In the purchase of bonds the value of a banking firm to a client depends upon the scope and efficiency of the service rendered and the integrity and experience of the firm.

Service

The service offered by N. W. Halsey & Company in buying bonds is a system of investigation more complete and more thorough than any individual investor could afford to undertake. This service has been built up by years of experience and engages the best legal, accounting and engineering experts, so that a statement that a bond is recommended by this firm means that the purchaser can reach an accurate conclusion as to its safety based on assured information.

The best method of investment in bonds is to deal steadily with a firm like this, getting the cumulative effect of its experience. We can offer you just as great a variety of safe bonds as you could buy by dealing with a number of firms.

Mortgage Investments

THE large mortgage is usually held by a man or a corporation who needs no advice as to the management of such a property, for it is with both a matter of daily business routine that seems to manage itself automatically.

We wish rather to consider the man who invests his hard-won savings in a small mortgage, hoping thereby to have his money perfectly secure, while at the same time it is producing a reasonable interest.

An Important Question

As all the large mortgages, first or last, come into the hands of the capitalist, either individually or through a financial corporation, the question naturally arises, Where is the small investor, the man with one or two thousand dollars, to find a mortgage security?

The answer might be: "If the man can't invest in a mortgage that is within his means, then let him find some other form of interest-producing investment."

Very true; but there are many reasons why the small investor prefers a mortgage. In the first place, a good real estate mortgage has the two great requisites of safety and stability. There is no other form of security that compares with land. It cannot move away and it is quite impossible for the area to grow smaller. The price may rise or fall, but this does not depend on the decrease or increase of land, but rather on the scarcity or abundance of our accepted medium of exchange—money.

Mortgage Advantages

One great advantage of the real estate mortgage is that it is not speculative, and so has none of the gambling features that make some other forms of investment alluring and—it might be added—destructive.

In the case of bond investments, the interest is fixed. The tendency in every change of bonds, from those of the government to the last issue of the newest railroad, is to lower the rate of interest. But while the real estate mortgage, like its near relative the corporation bond, has a fixed time to run, the time is usually so short that on renewal, advantage may be taken of the existing scarcity of money to demand a higher rate than that contracted for in the first period.

What Is a Mortgage?

A mortgage is not an actual transfer of property. It is a security given for the payment of a note or bond within a time specified. If the payment be not made, under the conditions stipulated, then the mortgaged property may be sold to liquidate the note or bond. If the payment be made as conditioned, the note is canceled, the mortgage satisfied, and the realty remains in the hands of the borrower.

A Great Business

The wholesale, and much of the retail, business of the world is done on credit. There are mortgage-brokerage establishments in all our large cities, where the visitor might easily get the impression that traffic in mortgages was the one great purpose of some of our brainiest men.

If on entering one of these great establishments you should give the impression that you are on the lookout for "a good thing" in the way of a mortgage, the "floor-walker" will spy you out. Of course, that is not the official title of the man, but you will find him quite as suave and with as much valuable information on tap as the expert director in a great department store. He will tell you about "choice first-class articles" of first mortgage, at from three and a half to five or six per cent., selling for a trifle above cost.

What You May Do

You enter one of these mortgage stores, if we may so call them, with your savings in your pocket in the form of a bank draft or a certified check, and you are offered your choice of a guaranteed or an unguaranteed mortgage. In the guaranteed mortgage, the principal and interest are guaranteed by the company, which collects and pays the interest semi-annually. Should you buy such a mortgage your investment will be quite as safe as if you had it in the savings bank, and it may pay you from one to one and a half per cent. more. Another advantage of such a mortgage is that the company must regard your interests as its own, and so you need not bother about the condition of the property or the ability of the original borrower to meet his obligation when due.

Watchfulness Necessary

But no matter how a mortgage comes into your possession, it is always well to know something about the property. A mortgage on the house in which the borrower lives is always more desirable than one on a vacant house, or on a tenement occupied by swarms of irresponsible dwellers. And so a mortgage on a store or factory in which the borrower is carrying on his own business is better than a store or factory owned by him but occupied by some other concern.

On such a guaranteed mortgage, should you invest in one, you will get four and a half per cent. The mortgage shows five per cent., but the half per cent. is retained to meet the cost of collection.

The unguaranteed mortgage is usually as safe as the guaranteed. It pays, or rather you get the full interest, whatever it may be, but you must yourself attend to the collection, for the selling company's interest ends with the transfer.

Something to Consider

Mortgages usually run for about three years, but one-half of them are renewed, not once but many times. The small investor may live in another county from that in which the mortgaged realty is situated, but at the proper time he must go there to enforce his claim, or if he has received notice that the mortgagor is ready to "satisfy" he must meet him at his place of business if so requested. Under such circumstances, it might save much trouble if the further care of the mortgage, after purchase, were left to some responsible party whose business it is to care for such matters.

Renewals

Should you hold such a mortgage as we have been considering, and the mortgagor wishes to renew it, and you are willing, it will be well, before the new papers are made out, that you take another look at the property, for though you are quite sure that the land is still there, the structures may not be the same.

If the mortgage happens to be on a dwelling house, it may not have been kept in proper repair; it may be occupied by tenants who endanger its safety, or other buildings may have been erected near by that have greatly depreciated the selling value of the property. Sometimes the fact that a saloon has been started near by, or that undesirable people have come into the street, will greatly injure residential property.

In such a case as we have just cited, a revaluation of the property must be had, either by your own counsel or by the agents of a company that makes a specialty of such work. The fee is from ten to twenty dollars, not much to be sure, but a great deal to a man who is getting four and a half per cent. on a one-thousand-dollar mortgage.

Wave of Infantile Paralysis

By SAMUEL G. TRACY, B.Sc., M.D., New York City

DURING the past year, there has been considerable interest excited by the numerous epidemics of poliomyelitis, or, as it is commonly called, "infantile spinal paralysis." These numerous outbreaks have led to a great deal of investigation on the part of physicians, which has materially advanced our knowledge of the nature of the disease.

Epidemics of infantile paralysis have long been known. In the United States, the earliest one was recorded in 1841. However, the prevalence of this epidemics was not especially notable until about fifteen years ago. An extensive epidemic took place in Sweden in 1905, two occurred in Australia (one in 1903 and the other in 1908), and one in Prussia in 1909. The principal epidemics which have occurred in this country during the past three years have been in Massachusetts, New York, Minnesota, and, during the past few months, in Rhode Island and Connecticut.

During the past summer months, and even to-day, communities in many States have suffered from epidemics of infantile paralysis of more or less severity. The disease is more common in cold than in warm countries. The majority of cases are seen in July, August, September, and October. There is no doubt that the disease is contagious, but a specific germ has not been found. Neither is the method by which the disease is communicated exactly known; however, there is good reason to believe that dust plays an important part in the dissemination of it. Dr. Flexner, from his investigations, has concluded that the virus is contained in the mucous membrane of the throat, and thus the disease is communicated through expectoration. As has been said, the nature of the poison that is responsible for this disease is not positively known, but that it is a living organism or germ there can be no doubt. This theory is based upon the experiments of Dr. Flexner. Boys and girls are subject to this disease with equal frequency, and from the more recent reports from New England, it is shown that even adults have become infected.

Infantile paralysis is most common in early childhood, with the exception of the first year. The greatest number of cases occur in the third and fourth years. This disease appears from three days to a month after exposure, usually before the tenth day. For many years it was impossible to say definitely where the seat of infantile paralysis was located. However, to-day, with all the auxiliaries of modern technique, and a careful study of the blood vessels which supply the spinal cord, we have positive proof that the disease is an inflammation of the gray matter in part of the spinal cord, and in the small blood vessels leading to this area.

The early symptoms of this disease, in many cases, are characterized by the child complaining of headache, listlessness, weakness of the limbs and loss of appetite. This condition is followed by fever (from 101 to 103 degrees Fahrenheit), distress in stomach and intestines and vomiting. The fever lasts from one to four days. In other more severe cases, the disease begins early with fever, followed by marked disturbance in the brain, accompanied by spasms or convulsions. Another uncommon type is where a child will go to bed apparently in perfect health and awaken in the morning paralyzed in one or more of its limbs.

The symptom of the second stage is paralysis itself. Generally speaking, it is rather extensive. In many cases, all four limbs are involved, and sometimes the muscles of the nape of the neck. In other cases, the paralysis involves only a group of muscles of one or both legs.

The extent of the immediate damage from the paralysis is usually complete within a few hours, although it may extend over a period of three or four days. In a week or ten days, some improvement begins, and this continues usually until only a small degree of paralysis remains.

In some epidemics, the infection is comparatively light, and complete recovery takes place in a few months. Nevertheless, when the paralysis is still present after a few months, it is likely to become more or less permanent, and as the child grows older, more or less deformity will be associated with it. However, the degree of deformity will depend somewhat on the skill and ability of the orthopedic surgeon who may treat the patient while growing.

There is one compensation to those who have had this disease, and that is, they are not likely to have it again.

The death rate from infantile paralysis varies considerably in various epidemics. In regard to the outlook for life, it is usually favorable; as regards perfect recovery, it is not so favorable. Frequently, some defect in the nutrition of the muscles, some deformity of limbs or partial paralysis remains. In a series of epidemics of this class, the death rate has varied, being as low as five per cent., and again as high as twenty per cent. In a recent virulent epidemic, the mortality was said to be forty per cent. However, generally speaking, the death rate is not great. In some families there may be a serious case and other members of the family may take it, but only in a light form. They will present several of the symptoms, but no paralysis. In the Boston epidemic of 628 cases, ten per cent. made a complete recovery. The prospect of recovery in a paralyzed limb is fairly good, although, when degeneration has taken place in the spinal cord and the cells which preside over the actions of the muscles have been destroyed, we can never hope for complete recovery.

In regard to treatment of the disease, there is as yet no specific cure; but from the researches of Flexner and Lewis, it is reasonable to suppose that an antitoxin or serum will be discovered that will prove as efficacious in infantile paralysis as does the diphtheria antitoxin in that malignant disease. It is during the fever and beginning of paralysis that treatment is most necessary; hence, it is of the utmost importance, in the earliest symptoms of illness in children, that infantile paralysis should be thought of and recognized.

DAME NATURE HINTS

When the Food is Not Suited.

When Nature gives her signal that something is wrong it is generally with the food. The old Dame is always faithful and one should act at once.

To put off the change is to risk that which may be irreparable. An Arizona man says:

"For years I could not safely eat any breakfast. I tried various kinds of breakfast food, but they were all soft, starchy messes which gave me distressing headaches. I drank strong coffee, too, which appeared to benefit me at the time, but added to the headaches afterwards. Toast and coffee were no better, for I found the toast very constipating."

"A friend persuaded me to quit the old coffee and the starchy breakfast foods, and use Postum and Grape-Nuts instead. I shall never regret taking his advice. I began using them three months ago."

"The change they have worked in me is wonderful. I now have no more of the distressing sensations in my stomach after eating, and I never have headaches. I have gained 12 pounds in weight and feel better in every."

"Grape-Nuts make a delicious as well as a nutritious dish, and I find that Postum is easily digested and never produces dyspepsia symptoms."

"There's a reason."

Chats With Young Folks

Fleda's Mudturtle

WHEN Fleda was five years old, she found a cent in the yard.

In great delight, she ran to tell her mother of her good luck.

"What shall I buy with it, mother?" she cried.

"Buy anything you like, my dear," she said kindly.

Fleda ran to the candy store, and looked around anxiously. She was greatly pleased with a tiny mudturtle in a little glass box. She thought that it was made of candy.

"I will play with it awhile and then I will eat it," she decided.

It was brown and looked like chocolate, which Fleda liked very much.

"I want the mudturtle," she said to the girl behind the counter.

By the time she had the little box fairly in her hand, she had made up her mind to eat the mudturtle right away.

She opened the box and also opened her mouth. She was just about to devour her pretty toy, when it suddenly began to crawl.

In her terror, Fleda dropped it and started to run; but a larger girl, who knew her, picked it up and said, "Come back here, Fleda, and get your nice little mudturtle. It won't hurt you."

She spoke so positively that Fleda felt quite calm again. She took her purchase, and ran home to tell her mother all about it.

Her mother had company and could not listen to Fleda's story. She said, "Yes, yes, dear—very fine, I am sure. Run away and don't bother me now."

"It will like to live outdoors, in a nice shady place, I think," she said to herself.

She placed it out in the yard under a big maple tree, and near the spot where she had found the penny.

But after she placed it on the ground, it did not crawl any more. Fleda wondered why.

She went in and got some bread for it; but the poor little mudturtle would not eat.

"Perhaps if I go and leave it, it will eat," said Fleda.

So she left it; but when she came the next morning, she found that still it had not eaten.

During the next few days, she tried every kind of food for it that she could find, but the little turtle did not touch any of it.

At last, she asked her mother to come and see what was the matter.

"Why, Fleda," said her mother, "of course it won't eat. It is a little wooden mudturtle, and it will crawl only when you press this spring in its body."

Then she and Fleda had a good laugh together, you may be sure.

A Grateful Dog

A True Story

MILDRED was walking along the quiet village street one day, when she came upon a great, noble-looking dog, lying beside the way.

The dog kept pawing at his mouth, which was wide open.

His evident distress prompted Mildred to come closer, though the girl who was walking with her said, "Don't you do it. He might bite you."

Mildred was used to dogs, and the look of anguish in the pleading brown eyes of this one determined her to find out just what was the trouble.

Scanning closely the big, red mouth, Mildred could see far back in it a long, slender bone, which had lodged there perpendicularly in such a way that, try as as he would, the poor fellow could not get it out.

Mildred was only nine, and it took considerable courage for her to put her little fist into that yawning red chasm and pull out the obstinate bone; but she did it.

In telling her mother about it, she said, "You never saw anybody so grateful as the dog was, mother. He tried to thank me with his eyes and his tail and his tongue and his paws and his whole body."

Very gravely and sedately he escorted Mildred quite home, and every time he saw her that summer, he would bound up beside her and walk with her as far as she would let him.

It really does seem as though dogs were sometimes even more grateful than human beings; but it is hardly safe to tamper with any and every dog. It is generally best to ask older people before touching a strange dog, even to help him.

Strange Reptiles

THE horned toad is a peculiar reptile, which is common in the deserts of the West. It can be tamed until it will take ants and flies from the hand.

The legless lizard is sometimes called the glass snake, or joint snake. It is found in Southern forests. If it is hit with a stick, it sometimes breaks into a number of fragments, and might reasonably be supposed to be killed; but, no—the broken parts are really only his tail, which is far more brittle than his body proper. He can lose it and still remain well and happy.

The worst lizard native to our country is probably the so-called "Gila monster," which frequents the Gila River districts, in the southwestern United States. It wears the Princeton colors of orange and black, and has a venomous and sometimes fatal bite.

His Four Paws

ONE of the pupils had just read a story in which a squirrel was said to be sitting on his hind legs, cracking a nut with his "fore paws."

"His four paws!" exclaimed another pupil, raising her hand quickly. "How could he be cracking a nut with four paws, when he was sitting on two paws?"

And yet we all know that this singular phenomenon might be seen whenever a squirrel nibbles a nut.

Erieside Bible Conference

A NEW summer conference, located at Erieside, Willoughby, O., fifteen miles east of Cleveland, held its second gathering lately. It stands on an orthodox platform, which includes Bible Inspiration; the Divinity and Atonement of Jesus Christ; the Person and Work of the Holy Spirit; the Imminent Return of the Lord, and the Evangelization of the World as the Responsibility of the Church.

The Conference was in session from 22d to 31st July. Its teachers were Dr. W. J. Erdman of Germantown, Pa., Professor W. G. Morehead of Xenia, O., Dr. H. P. Welton of Fort Wayne, Ind., and Dr. F. W. Troy of New York. It was especially favored in the presence and inspiring messages of the missionaries mentioned below, viz., Rev. M. C. Fenwick of Korea, Rev. W. P. Knight and A. P. O'Brien of China, Rev. S. Higginbottom of India, Revs. C. E. Hurlburt, R. V. Bingham and W. R. Hotchkiss of Africa and Rev. E. W. Clark of South America.

The "Sunrise Prayer Meetings" were seasons of blessing. At sunset, too, they gathered on the beach and closed the day with instruction, prayer and song.

The association is a chartered body, and owns a fine plot of land on which it has erected a tabernacle well suited to its needs, with abundant free space for the location of tents. The management purposes holding a midwinter conference in Cleveland. J. PHILLIPS.

Jews Accepting the Gospel

THE Lord's time to favor Zion is returning rapidly, if we may judge by recent startling movements among the ancient people of Israel. The nation itself is in a state of upheaval, unmoored from the anchors of the ages, and groping blindly for a new and safe harbor for a resting-place. This gives the Church of Christ one of the greatest opportunities of its history to evangelize this much-neglected, despised and persecuted people.

Mr. Claud Montefiore, scion of one of the oldest Jewish families of England, has recently electrified the Jewish world by espousing publicly the religion of Christ, and making a whirlwind tour of the United States to urge the 2,000,000 Jews of America to join him in his religion. In England his Jewish following is of such large proportions that the Jewish press of the world is becoming alarmed.

This is but one phase of what promises to be a great flocking of Jews to Christ, and it is not without its counterpart in other quarters. From Brooklyn, N. Y., we are in receipt of similar reports from the Williamsburg Mission to the Jews, founded and directed by ex-Rabbi Leopold Cohn, one of the foremost missionaries to the Jews in America. Just a little over a year ago the mission was obliged to move into larger quarters in which to carry on its work, and a building was erected for this special purpose, at a cost of $70,000. The name of this building is Beth Sar Shalom, meaning "The House of the Prince of Peace," and it is the only building in the United States used entirely and exclusively for Jewish-Christian work. From the first day that the new building was opened crowds of Jews began to come to the meetings. The first night there had to be turned away from the doors nearly five hundred for lack of room. In the last few months it has become necessary to provide still larger quarters. There have been some remarkable conversions.

A Hebrew Christian church has been organized, composed of fifty-four converts of the mission, who have to face bitter persecution and suffering. These meet regularly, enjoying one another's fellowship and encouraging each other by exhortation and testimony. The oldest member, who is eighty-two, had been ill, but insisted on being present at the recent celebration of the Sacrament. One member of this congregation (Mrs. K.), who had been suffering much in body and was healed by faith through prayer, gave a glowing testimony, which closed with these words: "I praise God and the Holy Messiah Jesus always and forever, even unto death. O dear Lord, bless Rabbi Cohn, because he showed me that precious light; bless his co-workers, and all those who help this precious and godly work."

Readers who are interested in ex-Rabbi Cohn's work can procure full information by addressing him at No. 201 Van Buren Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Making Bad Boys Over

THE world has become so tolerant and forbearing that the best men and women are inclined to believe that there is no such a thing as an absolutely incorrigible boy—a boy so bad that there is nothing to which one can appeal in his nature. Miss Bessie Clements, of Public School No. 9, Jersey City, is of this opinion. She is the teacher of a whole school of bad boys. The success of Miss Clements has been so marked that, four years ago, the school board of Jersey City decided to form a class of "incorrigibles" with Mrs. Clements as teacher. She now has 208 "incorrigibles" in her care, and the way in which some of them have "turned out" has been most gratifying to the school board and still more so to their tactful and earnest teacher. Speaking of her success in dealing with the "incorrigibles," she says:

Mrs. Bessie Clements

"I love boys and I like to see them get a square deal. If a boy has to live in a home which is only a hovel, and if he is underfed and overworked and abused by a drunken father, you can't blame him if he gets cranky and fussy in school and makes trouble for the teacher. That boy wants to know that there is somebody in this world who is willing to give him a square deal, and he will respond. Put some clothes on his back and some food in his stomach and show an interest in him, and he will be as good as any boy in the class."

Mrs. Clements puts her theory into practice by spending a good part of her salary of $1,300 a year in putting clothes on the backs and food in the stomachs of some of her "incorrigibles." She is a woman who "knows boys" and loves them. When a wise woman has this knowledge of boys and a genuine affection for them and finds her highest enjoyment in being helpful to them, even the worst of the "incorrigibles" is likely to be made the better through her uplifting influence. To Prove That You Can Artistically Color and Finish Any Kind of Wood About the Home

YOU can produce any desired shade and effect. The expense is slight—the work easy and simple. First apply Johnson's Wood Dye—made in 14 shades as listed below. Over the Dye lightly apply Johnson's Prepared Wax, and you have a beautiful, rich, subdued finish that will not mar or show scratches.

Johnson's Wood Dye must not be confused with colored varnishes or stains, which merely coat the surface of the wood, hiding the natural grain beauty. Johnson's Wood Dye is not a mere stain—not merely a surface dressing—it is a deep-seated dye which goes to the very heart of the wood and stays there, fixing a rich and permanent color.

Johnson's Wood Dye

is made in fourteen attractive shades, as follows:

No. 126. Light Oak	No. 110. Bog Oak	No. 131. Brown Weothered Oak
No. 123. Dark Oak	No. 128. Light Mahagany	No. 132. Green Weothered Ook
No. 125. Missian Oak	Na. 129. Dork Mahogony	No. 121. Moss Green
No. 140. Monilla Oak	No. 130. Weothered Oak	No. 122. Forest Green
No. 172. Flemish Ook		No. 178. Brown Flemish Ook

Pints, 50 cents each

Johnson's Prepared Wax

dries quickly over Dye or any other finish, so that it may be brought to a beautiful, dull, artistic finish. It should be used for all woodwork, floors and furniture, including pianos, and is just the preparation for Mission furniture.

Johnson's Under-Lac

is not a common varnish—but a thin elastic spirit preparation superior to shellac or ordinary varnish, and is to be used over Wood Dye where a higher gloss than a wax finish is desired, drying hard in half an hour. Best preparation for linoleum and oilcloth, bringing out the pattern as glossy as new. Gallons, $2.50—smaller sizes down to half pints.

ONE DOLLAR IS ALL!

Do you ever feel a desire to know more about your own country and the foreign countries, about the men and women who lived and fought and died that all nations might become peaceful and free from constant conflicts and bloody wars?

Wouldn't you enjoy your reading and your daily discussions with your friends and family more if you had an intelligent and accurate understanding of the reasons that caused these great events of earlier days to become forever unforgotten? What is History, anyway? Is it a compilation of dates and figures and measurements? No! It is a Story of Men and Women, the most interesting personalities the world has ever known, and as delineated in the the lives of these History-makers, these Epoch-markers, become as sweet and as intensely interesting as the leading characters in romance. Every page is a constant surprise, far more fascinating—even to those who dislike history—than any love story. We consider this set of 15 luxurious volumes a great work, an unusual work, a work of which we wish every one at least to know something. To visit with these characters, whose exceptional achievements in statecraft, science, literature, religion, and business have advanced civilization, results in a deeper appreciation of life as it is lived to-day. And just consider that you can get the "History of All Nations,"

Chances We Miss*

SOME philosopher has said that it is a common fault among men to "take trouble by the forelock and opportunity by the tail."

We see the good chances usually too late.

One reason why we miss many of them is because we are looking for great and important ones.

"I am very patriotic," you say; "no one would enlist more quickly than I, if a war should be declared."

And yet you may be utterly indifferent to the politics of your town or ward, neglecting attendance at the primaries and perhaps even failing to vote on election days.

The commonplace, dull routine which one must pursue in order to do one's daily patriotic duty, perhaps does not interest you. You need excitement and adventure to spur on your "patriotism."

Dr. A. J. Lyman has truly said, "The large use of common opportunities is better than the common use of large opportunities."

One reason why it is better is that the common opportunities are all that most of us have. If we do not seize them, we have none whatever to seize.

Another reason is because what may seem to us a small opportunity sometimes turns out to be a very large one.

A busy woman once turned aside from her important public work to do a service for a poor man. It involved an expense of time, labor and money which she felt that she could ill afford; but the man was in need and appealed to her, and she could but respond.

"You are foolish," her friends said. "Let others do such work as this."

But, lo! not long afterward, she greatly desired help in a certain way. The poor man had a friend who could supply it. He wrote to his friend, "Do all you can for Miss Blank. She saved my wife and family from ruin."

The bread cast upon the waters came back, and the debt was repaid in full.

"There is not a day," says Dr. J. R. Miller, "which does not bring some opportunity or occasion of turning aside. In whatever line of life, it usually begins in a small and imperceptible way. Take the matter of honesty. A man's simple promise is as good as his note. After a time he begins to be a little less exacting with himself. He has debts and he neglects to pay them on the day they are due. He begins to be less watchful in all his business dealings. In a few months he is quoted on the streets as slow, then as unreliable, and at last as a man who will pay only under compulsion.

"Lives continually fall into some such current and drift away. You are not quite so conscientious as you were last year. You are not quite so loving, so patient, so forbearing, so ready to serve. You are drifting away. It is the beginning of the departure against which we need to guard. A little girl was overheard telling her mother about a naughty child that grew naughtier and naughtier until at last 'he struck God.'

"Thus we often begin with only a shade of departure, yet end in defiant rebellion."

We are to watch not only for the chance which will push us upward, but for that which may pull us downward. We are not only to grasp for the opportunity to advance, but we are to guard against the chance which pulls us backward.

One stitch dropped as the weaver drove
His nimble shuttle to and fro.
One small stitch which could scarce be seen,
But the perfect pattern was marred for aye
By the one small stitch that was dropped that day.

Universal Peace*

GIBBON, the great historian, sai of the Byzantine Empire, "Alor in the universe, the self-satisfied pric of the Greeks was not disturbed by th comparison of foreign merit; and it no wonder that they fainted in th race, since they had neither compet tors to urge their speed nor judges crown their victory."

Now matters are very differen Elihu Root, one of our chief author ties upon international law, remin us that the nations are now nea neighbors. "The improved facilitie for travel and transportation, and th amazing development of the telegra and the press," have brought the na tions together. Distance has bee annihilated by these almost miraculou agents.

The consequence has been a redu tion of the world, as it were, to single community.

The result of this situation is th the nations hesitate more and mor from moral as much as from physic considerations, to plunge into war wi each other. The resultant rancor an bitterness, the disturbance of com merce, the checking of the ebb and flo of international travel—all these, to far greater extent than ever before the history of the world, influence i people for peace.

Greece would now find plenty competitors and judges, and its geni might reach an unheard-of develo ment under conditions like the preser

One of the newer organizations this country is the "Navy League Its aim is "to crystallize a widespre public sentiment in favor of a stro navy." It plans for a membership at least a million.

Both England and Germany ha strong navy leagues. Certain peop think that we ought to do everythi that England and Germany do; an that, therefore, we must have a nav league, too.

The Navy League devotes its ma attention to influencing the votes Congressmen and especially that the should vote for more and bigger ba tleships every year. It is true th we are expecting to have two ne ones each year, and to spend a score so of millions upon them, and upo the repairs and improvements, doc and cruises necessary to keep the afloat and to instruct and maintain practice the thousands of men wh man them.

"But," says the Navy League, "w must have a strong navy, no matt what it costs—stronger than En land's, if possible."

It is necessary that we should ha a good navy. We should have shi enough for the reasonable protectio of our commerce and our seaboar and to meet all our regular nation requirements. But there is nothin more demoralizing than these constan demands of the army and navy me for the enlargement of our fightin forces and equipment.

How can we make the other natio believe that we are sincere in ou pleas for universal peace, and the se tlement of all international disagre ments by reason instead of brute forc so long as we are continually strength ening our armaments?

We are the soldiers of the Prince Peace. His banner over us is lov As difficulties between man and ma are settled by law, so let us settle diffi culties between nations.

The world is a neighborhood no No nation is remote or isolated. W may easily devise an internation tribunal before which all great cas can be justly tried.

Such a tribunal would make for th uplift of men and the glory of God.

The Minister and Marriage Fee

England family. The bride, although stylishly gowned, puzzled the minister. There was an indefinable something about her personality which the preacher mistrusted—or, rather, could not understand.

"Have you $10 in change, sir?" asked the groom, producing a $20 bill; and the rector, who was well pleased with the fee, hastened to accommodate him. The couple bade him farewell and drove away in a cab.

Great was the consternation of the clergyman when he discovered that the $20 bill was a counterfeit, and that the impostor had disappeared with his $10. Later he learned that the "bride" was a youth of eighteen. The two rascals successfully practised this swindle upon ministers in several cities.

Every minister who has officiated at numerous weddings has encountered the man who takes his wife on probation before he comes to a decision concerning the fee.

"You will hear from me in six months. If she's any good, I'll send you $10; if she is a failure, I'll send you $2," said a Cincinnati man to the Lutheran minister who married him. The pastor was impressed with the novelty of the arrangement, but eventually came to the conclusion that it was another dodge to escape giving him a fee. However, he was mistaken; for at the expiration of the alloted time he received a note which read: "I inclose the $10 I promised you. Anna is worth every cent of it."

One June morning, several years ago, a sailor and his fiancée came to the rectory of a prominent downtown church in New York and asked the clergyman to marry them. After the ceremony, the groom took the rector aside and made a confession. He was almost penniless, he said, but intended to ship for Brazil within two weeks. When he returned he expected to have plenty of money.

"But I want to tell you it all depends on Mary," he said, pointing to his companion. "It's a big risk—this marriage business. A matey of mine shipped for Madagascar after being spliced to a girl, and came home to find his wife had skedaddled with a landlubber. If Mary sticks, I'll give you something handsome."

A year passed and the minister heard nothing from them. Occasionally the good man wondered whether Mary had "skedaddled." His curiosity was satisfied, one July afternoon, when a wagon stopped in front of the rectory and a dozen baskets of vegetables were left at the door. They were accompanied by a note from the sailor, informing the rector that this was his wedding fee.

> "I tuk sick in Buenos Ayres, and almost died in a hospytal," he wrote; "but when I got home I found Mary waiting for me. She has turned out all rite."

Strange as it may seem, there have been times when the marriage fee went astray. This occurred a few years ago in one of the suburbs of Buffalo, N. Y. Both bride and groom belonged to wealthy families, and the clergyman who officiated anticipated a handsome fee. His surprise was great, therefore, upon opening the envelope he received from the groomsman, to find it contained a $5 bill. While the minister stood there, the verger hurried in, almost dancing with delight as he exhibited five new $10 bills which his envelope contained. Neither envelope was addressed, and the rector immediately guessed the truth; namely, that the groomsman had carelessly mixed them, giving him the fee intended for the verger. But he was a young man and modest; so he held his peace. The delighted verger often speculated on the princely fee that the minister must have received on that occasion.

A Chicago minister who officiated at the wedding of a wealthy broker was surprised and somewhat disappointed when he found ten dollars in his envelope. Several years afterward the minister found an opportunity to relate the story at a dinner table where both he and the broker were guests. Of course, he mentioned no names, but the latter was quick to perceive that he was the subject of the anecdote. When the men were left alone, the broker asked if it were not true that he was the niggardly bridegroom referred to.

"Something queer happened that night," continued the broker. "Let me see—Tom B—— was my best man. He was always short of cash. There was $100 in your envelope when I handed it to him. How much did you say you found in it?"

"Ten dollars."

"Then T. B—— pocketed the rest."

On the following day the broker sent the clergyman a check for $90—the amount that had been stolen from the envelope.

The minister's family would suffer great privation were his income limited to his marriage fees. The rector of a rural parish near Newark, N. J., was drawn into an argument upon this subject by one of his parishioners, a doctor, who insisted that ministers derive larger incomes from their marriage fees than they are willing to admit. The clergyman assured him he was mistaken; but he remained skeptical.

"Now, I'll make you a proposition," said the physician. "In order to test my theory, I will agree to give you $5 in exchange for one-half of the next marriage fee you receive, whatever the amount may be. Is it agreed?"

"It is," said the rector.

A week later the clergyman called on the doctor, carrying a basket on his arm. The physician knew that his visitor had officiated at a wedding the night before, and reminded him of their agreement. Taking a $5 bill from his wallet, he laid it on the table.

"There is my money, John," he exclaimed. "Take it, and give me one-half of your fee. It was a bargain, man; remember, you agreed to it."

The minister hesitated. "I don't wish to take advantage of you, William," he began; "I warn you there is still time to withdraw——"

"I'll stick to my bargain; you stick to yours," laughed the physician, slapping the table."

"Very good; here is the fee," said the clergyman; and, tilting the basket, he rolled out upon the table, under the doctor's nose, two fat little puppies.

A LIVING FROM POULTRY

$1,500.00 from 60 hens in ten months on a city lot forty ft. square.

To the average poultryman that would seem impossible, and when we tell you that we have actually done a $1,500 poultry business with 60 hens on a corner in the city garden, 40 feet wide by 40 feet long, we are simply stating facts. It would not be possible to get such returns by any one of the systems of poultry keeping recommended and practiced by the American people, still it can be accomplished by

The Fastest Growing Spot in the World

The land on which these buildings stand has sold at from $1500 to $3000 per lot. Equally beautiful property at the lower edge of this picture is now offered at $790 'till the small supply is exhausted.

A New York City Lot Near a Subway Station for $790--$6 a month

DO you know that one out of every eighteen people of the entire ninety million population of the United States lives in New York City, and do you know that New York City is growing as never before, and that about 40% of its increased population is going to Brooklyn, where our properties are located?

Brooklyn's assessed valuation has increased 745 million dollars in the past ten years, millions of which have been made by our customers alone.

Oak Crest was our first property, with 324 customers, and their lots have increased from $208,710 to $1,043,550 in ten years, based on actual sales. Then came the Lindens with 260 customers. Their lots increased from $164,680 to $676,000 in nine years. Next came Kings Oaks, a small property, with only 180 customers, and their lots increased from $200,740 to $620,000 in about seven years.

Today we offer West Brownsville—a splendidly laid out tract of land immediately adjoining the tenements of the rapidly growing Brownsville district—with the Utica Avenue subway coming on one side and the Livonia Avenue subway on the other—at prices ranging from $790 to $1,190, according to location.

Take note, please—We bought our land at the prices 12 years ago—We are therefore the only concern who can still afford to sell first class property on instalments, and ours will soon be gone.

Subway Built? Not Yet

If it were, you would pay $4,000 per lot instead of $790. But the Utica Avenue subway (5 minutes' walk to the west) and the Livonia Avenue line (3 minutes' walk to the north of West Brownsville) will be constructed, and soon. The Public Service Commission has already officially approved the routes and the new law has provided the way for immediate construction through a small annual assessment for ten years, averaging about $12 per lot per year. Hence, we do not have to wait on the City's credit. Under this plan, early completion of the subways is assured. Before one dollar assessment is collected from you your land will be selling for thousands where it is now bringing hundreds.

CHRISTIAN HERALD OFFICIALS EXAMINE OUR PROPERTIES

Mr. Otto Koenig, President of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and Mr. Theodore Waters, Secretary of the company, on the 6th day of September, 1910, made a careful examination of the properties we are offering the public. Mr. Koenig made the following voluntary statement: "This is certainly wonderful—I think you are offering splendid investments to the people." Two hours later Mr. Koenig and Mr. Waters each bought property upon just the terms and at just the prices you can secure yourself. What greater indorsement could we have?

OUR REFERENCES

Bradstreet's and Dun's rate us higher than any real estate concern in the world. For further information, apply to any commercial agency, bank, trust company or to any of the prominent magazines of the country and you can secure complete information as to our financial standing and reputation.

Never again (and "never again" is a long time) will Brooklyn lots be offered at such low prices and little monthly payments. We know better than anyone else how little land is really left in Brooklyn. The selling of a part of our land at $790 per lot will enable us to hold and get $2,000 for every lot we hold, and for some, twice $2,000.

Remember, $10 starts you. The balance can be paid in monthly payments of $6 and upwards. Remember, also, that our offer carries a free deed or money back in case of death, high-class improvements free, a free round trip (railroad fare) to New York, east of Chicago or like distance.

You have absolutely nothing to lose by writing at once for full particulars or, better still, get best choice by sending us $10, the first payment on a lot, with the distinct understanding that if you are not entirely satisfied with our selection, we will at once return your money. But write anyway. You will not be fair to yourself if you do not look into this offer. It will cost you but 2c and a minute's time. Isn't it worth while?

WOOD, HARMON & CO., DEPT. B 9 261 Broadway, N.Y.

MONEY BACK IF NOT SATISFIED

Come to New York at any time within a year after you purchase; visit our properties; keep what you have if you think it is the best bargain in our $10,000,000 holdings; change to any other lot if you will, or go to our cashier's desk and get back every dollar you have paid us. It is all the same to us. We would prefer to have you a good friend and not a customer, rather than a customer and not a good friend. But a decision is required at the time of examination of property and the offer extends only to those who visit New York within said year. In other words, we do not give options. We do give you twelve months to examine your property and get your money back if you are not satisfied.

Our "money back and free transportation" offers, are both limited to 12 months from date of purchase.

THE REVOLUTION IN PORTUGAL

PORTUGAL has just passed through a revolution which, in many respects, is one of the most remarkable in modern history. For er a year the tempest had been gathering. It oke suddenly on the night of Monday, October At 1.30 A.M. Tuesday the capital was aroused by e firing of cannon. Instantly the populace poured o the streets and the whole city became a scene tumult and riot. Flashes of artillery fire punc-ated the darkness of the night and the rattle of usketry and the explosion of bombs were incessant. dawn broke, the firing increased in intensity. A rce of insurgents, encamped on a height, tried to ht their way to the centre of the city, but were iven back by troops and police. Soon, however, it came clear that the troops mpathized with the revolu-nists. The latter captured e barracks of the First Artil-y Corps, and a sharp strug-e took place in which many re shot. In several instances e troops themselves threw en the barracks and armories the citizens and supplied em with rifles and ammuni-n.

Admiral Carlos Reis, a re-ed naval officer, directed the erations of the insurgents. ve generals were associated th him in the direction of litary affairs. Everything s carefully planned before-nd. Two naval vessels in the rbor, the cruiser Adamastor d the cruiser Rafael, were ing with the revolutionists d kept up a continuous bom-rdment of the palace, in ich King Manuel and the er members of the royal mily were practically prisoners. The police were werless to stem the tide of attack in the streets, d when troops were summoned to their assistance e majority of the soldiers left their ranks and de common cause with the insurgents.

Meanwhile, all telegraphic and other communica-n with Lisbon had been temporarily cut off. ere was evidence of a skilfully laid plot on the rt of the insurgent leaders, to prevent the outer rld from knowing of the tragic events that were ing place. Railway bridges were dynamited in effort to check the arrival of reinforcements of al troops. The government was stronger in the ovinces than in the capital, and while the insur-nts were almost certain of capturing Lisbon, they d little hopes of making headway in other cities. t the tide of insurrection, once started, gained in strength and volume hourly. Early on Wednesday the barracks contiguous to the palace was won after a bitter struggle. King Manuel, on learning of this, sought shelter at Cascaes with four attendants.

As the fighting went on bodies of troops began to arrive from the provincial garrisons. Thousands of peasants, who had entered Lisbon the night before, joined the insurgents and fought stoutly against the loyal regiments. All day the conflict raged. Company after company of the troops revolted. One artillery regiment rode down its colonel and officers and attacked the barracks. Other regiments of infantry, cavalry and artillery killed their officers who resisted. At every point the royalists met defeat, for the revolutionists were well supplied with arms and used them like veterans. Over 2,000 men are reported as killed and wounded in the street fighting. Signals were exchanged between the victorious republicans and the warships lying in the river and the latter hoisted the republic flag. It was also hoisted on the Almado Fort and at Barreiro. Soon the royal ensign which flew from the palace flagstaff was seen to fall and in its place there quickly appeared the red and green standard of the republic.

King Manuel, the Queen-Mother Amelie, and the Queen Dowager Maria Pia meanwhile made good their escape from Cascaes and found a refuge at Mafra, some twenty-three miles northwest of Lisbon. No attempt was made by the revolutionists to restrain them. On Thursday, October 7, the ex-king and his mother, the Dowager Maria Pia, and the other members of the royal household left their temporary shelter and went to Gibraltar to embark there on the royal steam yacht for England. Dowager Maria Pia, it is understood, will be transferred to an Italian warship and conveyed to her friends at Naples.

After the capture of Lisbon, the republicans formed a provisional government composed as follows:

President, Theophile Braga; Minister of Justice, Alfonso Costa; Minister of Foreign Affairs, Barreto; Minister of Marine, Finance, Bazilio Telles; Minister of Public Works, Antonio Luiz Gomes; Minister of War, Colonel Barreto; Minister of Marine, Amaro Azovado Gomes; Minister of the Interior, Antonio Almeida; Civil Governor of Lisbon, Eusebio Leao.

The first official act of the new government, after taking office, was to issue this proclamation:

> The people, army and navy have succeeded in proclaiming a republic. The Braganza dynasty, mischievous and disturbing to social peace, has been forever exiled from Portugal.
> This rare event, representing the pride of an untamable race and the salvation of a country whose bravery is proverbial, fills with enthusiastic joy the hearts of patriots and finally ends our country's bondage.
> Our aspiration for a regime of liberty stands revealed brightly in its virgin essence.
> Citizens! The present moment redeems and recompenses for all the struggles and the sorrowful apprehensions we endured. This moment must be the commencement of a period of austere morality and immaculate justice, in order that the glorious communion of principles shall make of our sacrifices for our country the base of our political programme and our generosity toward the vanquished, and the base of our moral programme.
> Citizens! Let interest for our beloved country animate you and a single desire—that to be great—unite you. The republic has confidence in the people for the maintenance of social order, respect for justice and devotion to the common cause of liberty. Consolidate with your love and sacrifice the work which springs from the Portuguese republic.

President Braga also issued a manifesto to the army and navy urging all to swear allegiance to the new régime. Civil Governor Leao issued an order to the people of Lisbon commanding all to respect persons and property of both Portuguese and foreigners. On Wednesday evening the situation in the capital was reported to be peaceful and orderly. The new flag of the republic was flying over all the public buildings. Here and there groups of citizens were singing the Portuguese "Marseillaise." The Spanish Minister called to pay his official

A SERMON BY

Rev. A. B. Simpson, D.D.*

The Irrepressible Question

TEXT—Matt. 27:22

THIS is the greatest question of earth and heaven. Could we penetrate the veil which hides that great assembly from our view and ask the Father of glory this question, the heavens would open again and the eternal voice would answer, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Could we ask the brightest intelligences of the angelic host, "What think ye of Christ?" instantly along the sky would roll in answering thunder the mighty hallelujah, "Blessing and glory and thanksgiving and honor and power and might be unto him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb," while innumerable ransomed saints would respond with the loud amen and repeat the new chorus, "Thou art worthy to receive power and riches and glory and blessing, for thou wast slain and thou hast redeemed us from every kindred and tongue and tribe and nation." Or shall we ask the saints of God who have lived and died on earth, "What think ye of Christ?" and I hear Paul repeating, "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift. That in all things he might have the pre-eminence. I count all things but loss for the knowledge of the excellency of Christ Jesus, my Lord," while Peter repeats again, "Whom having not seen ye love, in whom, though now we see him not, we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." And John takes up the heavenly climax, "Unto him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father, unto him be glory and dominion both now and forever. Amen."

The Danger of Misunderstanding

But this question is far more than an optional one, a matter of opinion or theory. It is the most practical and important question you have ever faced. What we think of Christ determines our thoughts, convictions and principles on all other religious questions. Christ is the key to the whole system of truth; nay, Christ is himself the truth. If you have wrong views about the deity of Christ, you will not want to trust your immortal soul to his hands. If you have wrong views about the virgin birth of Christ, the glorious doctrine of the incarnation will mean nothing to you, and Jesus will be but a man a little better than the rest of them. If you have wrong views about the cross of Jesus Christ and his atoning blood, you will miss your soul's salvation and go to work to seek your own righteousness instead of his. If you have wrong views about the resurrection of Christ, he will not be to you a living Christ and there will be no satisfying evidence of the truth of Christianity of which the resurrection is the corner stone. It is a matter of supreme importance that you should rightly understand and believe in Jesus Christ as the eternal Son of God, as the Word made flesh, as the Lamb of God whose blood taketh away the sin of the world and as the glorious Prince of life who was dead and is alive for evermore.

Our Destiny in the Balance

What we think of Christ and what we do with Christ will determine our eternal destiny. The salvation of every soul hinges upon its relation to Christ. Forever the picture hangs "on either side one and Jesus in the midst." "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth upon him." "There is no name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved, but the name of Christ." Only the friends of Christ can find acceptance in the Father's love and the Father's home and the Father's house. All things have been handed over by him to Jesus Christ and the destiny of every man and woman depends upon his or her treatment of Jesus. There is a quaint story told of a rich man who lost his only son and after his own death his will could not be found. After searching vainly the State attorney took up the case and ordered his property sold and his estate settled. On the day of the auction a poor old woman who had once nursed his only child begged the auctioneer to let her buy the picture of the boy. She had only a shilling, but nobody seemed to care for it, so it was knocked down to her. And she went home happy in having the portrait of the child she had so fondly loved. One day when repairing the back of the picture she found a legal document inside the wooden back. She hurried to the lawyer and delivered it up in much concern. After he had glanced at it he called her to him and said, "You have certainly made a great find. This is the old man's will and in it he has left all his property to anybody who loved his boy well enough to buy his picture at the auction sale when the estate is settled." The old woman had not only a picture of the son she loved, but with it the whole inheritance. Dear friends, God, too, has left a will by which all his fortune becomes the inheritance of those and those alone who love the Lord Jesus Christ well enough to make him their own. "What will you do with Jesus who is called Christ?" "What think ye of Christ?"

Our Attitude Toward Christ

What we think of Christ determines our spiritual character. He alone can purify our hearts and transform us into the likeness of God. He is our holiness, our love, our peace, our joy. He only can counteract the attraction of the world and lift our lives to noble service, sacrifice and consecration. He alone can keep us in the hour of temptation, unspotted from the world, and unstained by sin. He is our very life. He is the channel through whom alone we can meet with God and maintain communion in prayer and fellowship. He alone can quicken and heal the suffering bodies, can clarify and strengthen our intellects, can satisfy our hearts' deepest longings, can comfort and sustain us in life's great hours of trial, can inspire us to noble service, and can uphold and make us more than conquerors in life's last hour. For Christ is the very substance of personal Christianity and apart from him we can do nothing. Your attitude to Christ, therefore, is all important and there is no question so imperative, so immediate, so pressing as the question of our text, "What will ye do with Jesus who is called Christ?" This is the supreme question which the world is discussing to-day. Countless volumes have been written in the past century on the Person of Christ, the Deity of Christ, the Virgin Birth of Christ, the Atonement of Christ, the Resurrection of Christ. The host of heaven and hell to-day are marshaled around the standard of Jesus and men are asking with an intensity of interest never known before, "What think ye of Christ?"

Our Testimony for Christ

No question can be of such supreme importance. Are we concerned for the salvation of sinners here? There is no other name under heaven by which men can be saved. Are we seeking the baptism of the Holy Spirit? The one supreme business of the Holy Spirit is to take of the things of Christ and show them unto us. Have we come to find the secret of victory over sin? This is the victory, "The Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." Are we seeking and longing for help and healing? God's secret of healing is, the life also of Jesus made manifest in our mortal flesh. Do we long for a deeper and a higher Christian life? This is the secret of it all, "That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith and that ye being rooted and grounded in love, may comprehend with all saints the height and depth and length and breadth of the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, that ye may be filled with all the fulness of God." Are we looking out upon the future and longing for the blessed hope of the better age? The object of that hope is his personal coming. Are we here to consecrate our service afresh and receive new orders from our Master? He is our Master, and it is at his feet that we are to lay our lives in consecration and service. Are we looking out upon white fields of the heathen world? It is he that is calling from the darkness, "Come over into Macedonia and help us," and it is his love alone that can inspire the great campaign which is to evangelize the nations. So that Jesus is for us in these hallowed days the first and the last and all in all.

What is our testimony for Christ? "What think ye of Christ?"

1. We acknowledge him and worship him as the eternal Son of God, the brightness of the Father's glory, the express image of his person, the same in substance and equal in power and glory. This Jes is our God manifest in the flesh.

2. We acknowledge him as the Son of man. W believe in the virgin birth and the holy incarnati and that in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Go head bodily. While he is very God of very God, is also very man with a true body and a reasonal soul in all points like us except sinning. In t weary body, sleeping in the hinder part of the sh we behold the Son of man, but in the mighty vo that quells the tempest we hear the Son of Go Weeping at Lazarus' grave we see the Son of ma but crying, "Lazarus, come forth," we see the Dei of Christ. Hanging on the cross and dying agony, "Behold the man," but rising in majes from Joseph's tomb, he is declared to be the Son God with power by the resurrection from the dea And so we recognize him as our brother and o God, our Kinsman, our Redeemer and our divi Master.

3. We believe in his cross and his precious blo as the expiation of human guilt, the ransom of l men, the satisfaction of divine law and righteou ness and the ground of our justification and salv tion; and in an age of cold, ethical formalism sing with louder triumph.

An Acknowledged Saviour

4. We believe in his resurrection. We der repudiate and denounce the latest lie of liber theology, that that wounded, lazaretted form Jesus of Nazareth still lies in Joseph's tomb a that the Syrian star looks down upon his dust a that the resurrection of Christ is only a great sp itual truth. Nay, the very cornerstone of Chr tianity is the testimony of the risen Christ as t glorious Prince of life, "I am he that liveth and w dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore."

5. And we here declare and reaffirm our spec witness that this Christ, the Son of God incarna crucified and risen from the dead, is our Savio our Sanctifier, our Healer and our coming Lord, whom be glory and dominion and love now a forever.

The time has gone by to wave aside the Lo Jesus with a toss of your head and a motion of yo hand and say with cheap and easy infidelity, "C there is no certainty about Jesus Christ anyho The higher critics are questioning his deity a questioning his virgin birth and questioning l atonement and questioning his resurrection; a when they get through with their discussion the will be time enough for me to take up the questi for myself." My friend, the very fact that t higher critics are so troubled about this Christ a that the whole world of scholarship is engaged trying to settle the question of the Christ is the be evidence of his reality and importance. The de would not be fighting so hard against him if the was nothing to fight about. The very best tes monies for the greatness and glory of Christ co from many distinguished scholars who are not pa ticularly interested as his followers and frien Listen to some of them.

Testimony of Great Minds

I hear Rousseau, the great Frenchman, declarin "To have invented the story of Jesus would ha been a greater miracle than the story itself. If was a literary fiction, pray, who was the brillia author and how is it that we have never heard h name? Nay, it is easier to believe that Jesus liv than to believe that the story of Jesus is a lie."

Theodore Parker writes: "He unites in himse the sublimest precepts and divinest principles, th more than realizing the dream of prophets a sages, rising free from all prejudices of his ag nation and sect, and pours out a doctrine beautif as the light, sublime as heaven and true as God Goethe calls him the divine Man, the type and mod of all men. Renan declares of Jesus, "The mo beautiful incarnation of God, God in man. Gre and beautiful, a thousand times more real tha insipid earthly greatness or insipid earthly beauty Strauss calls him the highest object we can possib imagine. "Never will it be possible to rise abo him or imagine any one who shall ever be equal wi him." Lecky, the great historian, declares, "T brief record of his short years has done more al judgment of Jesus. The enemies Christ had brought the Lord before litic man would accept their word ncerning his guilt and condemn him

THE STATUE OF LIBERTY

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

FRIDAY, October 28. If you are in or near New York this will be the proper time to visit the Statue of Liberty. Why? Because on October 28, 1886, this great Statue of Liberty was unveiled. It was the gift of France to the United States, and stands on Bedloe's Island as a perpetual reminder of the good will between these two countries. Its height, from low water mark to the top of the torch, is 305 feet 11 inches. The statue itself, which is in the form of a woman holding a torch in her hand, is 152 feet.

WHEN strangers from other countries come up our beautiful bay this is one of the first sights they see, and it tells them that they are coming into the land where Liberty is Enlightening the World.

When we speak about this being the Land of Liberty, what do we mean? Does liberty mean to do as you please? You have liberty to throw a stone, but your liberty ceases when you throw that stone at some one. You have the liberty to use your voice, and you can shout and yell as long and loud as you are able; but your liberty ceases when your shouting and yelling annoys some sick person or makes some person nervous who wants to feel well. Liberty is the privilege of doing anything that you please within the limits of law. Our text says, "Whoso breaketh a hedge, a serpent shall bite him." The hedge means law. There is a hedge, or law, around your playground and around your house and around your father's farm. The line fence is a law between your father's farm and some other man's farm. Your father has liberty to plant whatever he pleases on his side of the fence, but he does not have the liberty to plant anything on the other side of the line fence. Breaking through the hedge means breaking a law. Whenever you do anything the law tells you not to do, then you break through a hedge. The bite of the serpent means punishment for breaking the law. Every time we break a hedge or break a law there is a punishment. In the old hedges spoken of in our text, serpents found their homes. When one broke through a hedge these serpents became angry and would bite the breaker.

OUR text takes a hedge as an illustration to show us that when we break a law we shall surely be punished.

We have a great amount of liberty—more liberty than is given to the people of any other nation in the world—but this liberty ends at the hedge, or the law, that has been made by God and man.

The law of God is to protect us and to bless us. When, therefore, you are looking at the Statue of Liberty remember it is the corner post of the great hedge or law around our country.

This Statue of Liberty was once worshiped as an idol. An aged woman and her grown son were on their way from Mount Lebanon to the United States. When they saw the great statue, nobody told them what it was, and they thought it must be Christ, representing the Christian land which they were about to enter. They dropped upon their knees on the deck of their ship and poured out their love and gratitude for the welcome which the outstretched arm seemed to offer them. Liberty is the gift of Christ, but it is not to be worshiped. We worship Christ, who gave us Liberty and protected our liberty by law. Tell you a story?

ABOUT two thousand years ago the Chinese people were in great trouble. Toward the north of China there was an enormous plain, and it was one of the most fruitful and productive in the world. The people who lived on the plain were farmers. Farther north was the country of the Tartars; these people lived by robbery, and when they looked at their neighbors' prosperous farms they were filled with envy. They made a raid on the land of the peaceful Chinamen, stole everything that they could lay their hands on, and beat or killed those who made any objection. The raids happened so often that the poor farmers did not know what to do, and were quite in despair. At last they made a complaint to their emperor, and he caused a wall to be built so as to prevent the Tartars from entering China.

The Great Wall of China is one of the wonders of the world. It is called the Wan-li-chang, or Myriad Mile Wall. Its length is about one thousand five hundred miles, so that it would stretch in a straight line half way from America to England. It winds about, now climbing a mountain to a height of five thousand feet, now crossing a level plain, and now spanning a river.

THE wall is twenty feet high, with towers twice that height and forty feet square at the base, standing at intervals of a hundred yards from each other. These towers were used as posts of observation, and the watchmen stationed in them could give timely warning of the approach of the Tartar foe. On the top of the wall is a great road along which three automobiles could run side by side. This wall gave the Chinese liberty and protected them from their enemies.

Liberty and law are our two friends.

Dr. Abbot tells us the difference between advice and law. A doctor says to a child: "'You have been working too hard and sleeping too little. You ought to go to bed every night at nine o'clock.' That is advice, but not law. Then the father says, 'My child, you hear what the doctor said, and you must go to bed every night at nine o'clock.' This is law." This is the Chinese wall about the child for its protection.

should be crucified, calmly washing his hands and declaring, "I am innocent of this man's blood." But all the water in the universe could not have washed out the stain of deicide. Henceforth he was the murderer of the Son of God. And it was not long until the price for which he had sold the Lamb of God turned into rottenness in his blood-stained hands. The office which he had saved at the sacrifice of principle was torn from him and in exile and disguise, tradition tells us, he at last hurled himself from an awful precipice in Switzerland on whose naked cliffs some of us have gazed over yonder as it looks down upon the Lake of Lucerne and seems forever to whisper, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world, but lose his own soul?" Men and women, you are selling conscience, principle and Christ with your own souls thrown in for some worthless bauble. But wake up to-day from your blindness and ask, is it worth while? "What will you do with Jesus?" Oh, brother, oh sister, you must do it now!

A Democratic King's Home

THE "palace" of King Nicholas of Montenegro, says a writer in the Westminster Gazette, boasts an ample but treeless garden. One encounters a sentry or two at the door. Otherwise there is no evidence of kingly state. Nikita is the appellation of his Majesty among his aged subjects, who deem him an elder brother and treat him accordingly. Venerable as are his years, he has lost none of his early interest in sport. It is said that he can still remove a cigar from the lips of an old friend by the primitive expedient of shooting it away with a revolver at thirty feet. He can throw an egg in the air and shoot it into fragments while yet aloft. His traits reflect a stern frugality. The expenditure of his married daughters upon clothes still worries him. The Montenegrin King still puts money in the savings bank and urges the habit upon his people. He remonstrated with a hotel keeper who bought himself a gold watch, pointing out that his own was brass. His Majesty makes no concealment of his conviction that European kings are too extravagant in their mode of life, thus setting a bad example to their subjects. His Majesty carried this passion for economy to the length of forbidding the only millionaire among his people from buying a costly motor car in Paris. "Your sovereign cannot afford such a luxury," his Majesty is quoted as having said. The car was not purchased.

Sailors from the Battleships Bound for Shore

Seaman McMaine

Launches Tying Up to the Pier

ON the morning of October 2 the country was saddened by the news flashed over the wires that in a time of peace twenty-seven sailors of our navy had perished in the swift current of the Hudson River, where the North Atlantic fleet swung at anchor a little off shore from upper New York. It would take the naval fatalities of several Spanish Wars to equal this loss of life, which came at a moment when the thought of death could not have been farther from the happy, care-free minds of the men who returned from the delights of "shore leave" only to find a watery grave within call of their own ships.

Seven warships of the Atlantic fleet had steamed up through the Narrows two or three days before the disaster, and the tars on board eagerly anticipated a short stay in New York, with shore leave at frequent intervals to see the sights and to dispose of the two hundred thousand dollars and more which had come to them out of the pay chest of Uncle Sam. Pay-day, shore leave, and New York all at once made an unusually attractive combination, which wreathed the faces of the men with smiles. They rightly felt they had earned a little pleasure on account of the good work done at target practice on the high seas. They had proved themselves the finest gunners in the world, annihilating every target at six miles, some of the ships doing it with the first salvo.

The general landing pier for the ships' launches was at the foot of One Hundred and Fifty-eighth Street. This stretch of the river, in front of the picturesque Palisades, has become the usual anchorage for warships visiting the city, and it was between this pier and the battleship New Hampshire that the disaster occurred. The launches of the different ships were filled several times a day with sailors on shore leave. The boats would hold as many as a hundred men and were towed by one of the fussy, sputtering steam launches from one of the great warships.

On the evening of October 1 the pier swarmed with a crowd of sailors returning to the battleships and skylarking until the "tow" was made up. One of the big sailing cutters was from the New Hampshire and was attached to the steam launch by a long cable. The boats were under the command of a young midshipman, who only completed the course at Annapolis last June. His name was Godfrey de Courcelles Chevalier—a name which calls for courageous deeds on the part of the one who carries it—and the midshipman proved his right to such a historic appellation. For before the night was done he had saved with his own hand over twenty sailors from a watery grave.

The men jumped into the launch as soon as it reached the pier, pushing and joking, and unfortunately paying too little heed to the way in which they arranged themselves. It seems as if too many had gathered forward and depressed the bow. The two boats started off from shore at about a quarter to seven. A stiff breeze was blowing and suddenly the bow of the launch dipped under a wave and she nearly swamped. The sailors pushed to the rear now, making matters worse; and the next moment the water was pouring over the sides and they felt the boat sinking beneath their feet. Most of the men were pitched into the water; some caught the edge of the boat, which still floated, nearly submerged, and urged the men struggling in the water to do likewise. Some could swim, others could not; and in the darkness they floundered aimlessly for a few moments in the swift current. Suddenly the men on the steam launch saw that their "tow" had disappeared, and they set their whistle tooting wildly, bringing launches from the fleet and from the shore.

Sailors of the New Hampshire, Gathering on the After Deck

Chevalier swam about in the water directing t swimmers to the launches, and dragging one e hausted sailor after another to the side of the boa where they were pulled in, while he would sw back to get another. The launch Mary, owned George Reeves, rescued sixteen men; the Heron g fifteen; boats from the Kansas and Louisiana g some. Chevalier refused to leave the water, b was pulled into a launch and taken to the Louisia Even then he pleaded for a chance to go back ir the river to see if he could not find some more those who had gone overboard, and almost fought throw himself into the current. His heroic effo had exhausted him so much that it was consider dangerous to have him go to his own ship. insisted and finally went on boa the New Hampshire, where was put under the care of t battleship's surgeon. Seve sailors worked like heroes to sa their comrades. Seaman McMa saved five who were just goi down for the last time.

For a day or two it was dou ful what number had perished. few who had overstayed their ti came aboard, relieving the anxi of the officers and of the relati who had been notified of the ac dent by telegraph. The crews the battleships searched the ri for the bodies and the harl police worked with grappli irons.

Some people expressed surpr that all of the seamen were able to keep afloat. TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD —AVIATOR WYNMALEN, a Frenchman, on October 1, reached the height of 9,971 feet in a biplane at Mour-Melon, Le Grand, France, being the highest yet recorded.

—150,000 COTTON spinners are locked out by a shut down of cotton mills in Manchester, England. The trouble originated over a small strike in a nearby mill, involving only 75 men, and the manufacturers refused to arbitrate.

—THE BUILDING and newspaper printing plant of the Los Angeles (Calif.) Times was destroyed by explosion and fire on October 1. Nineteen employees were killed and 25 injured, and the loss to property is estimated at $500,000. It is charged that the building was deliberately destroyed by enemies of the paper and the police are making a thorough investigation. The management of the paper had a duplicate plant in another locality in anticipation of such a contingency. $100,000 reward has been offered for the detection of the wreckers.

—QUEEN MOTHER AMELIE, according to the reports of visitors at the Portuguese Court, treated King Manuel, her son, like a child. One day not long ago, he accidentally broke a window. Amelie, in presence of the court circle, which included generals, admirals and ambassadors, rebuked the king so shrewishly that those who heard her were astounded. Manuel left the room looking like a whipped schoolboy. Naturally, the incident leaked out in the clubs and cafes and it was not surprising that the indiscretion and hot temper of Amelie should have helped to convince the Portuguese army and navy officers that any change would be preferable rather than to continue with such a "boy-king."

—EARLY NEXT month the Postal Savings Bank system will go into operation, and soon thereafter some 40,000 of the total of 60,000 post offices will have postal banks. There will be no pass-books. These certificates will be made out for sums ranging from $1 to $9 and there will be certificates for $10, $20 $50, the higher certificates being in duplicate—one for depositor, the other kept by the bank. Provision has also made for juvenile depositors, who can put in their dimes, being represented by a 10-cent stamp in lieu of certific When a child deposits a dime he gets in return a white with one 10-cent stamp in the centre. Mounted Warriors of the Bedouin Tribes Attacking a Caravan of European Travelers

THIS picture, from a drawing by Caton Woodville, in the Illustrated London News, represents a scene that is enacted frequently among the warlike Bedouin tribes of Arabia. Marauding is the great "sport" of the Arabs. Roving bands of robbers infest the deserts; but it is not often that one of the pillaging expeditions picks up such a rich prize as a European. A traveler, Mr. Douglas Carruthers, was "held up" by a band of one hundred and fifty warriors in the manner shown, while making his way across the Arabian desert. He narrowly escaped losing all his belongings. Robbery, not murder, is the object of the marauders.

HOW "GOD'S IGLOO" WAS BUILT

By CHRISTIAN SCHMITT, Labrador

IT is again my privilege to thank you and the kind CHRISTIAN HERALD readers for a gift of $30, which I received recently from you for our Labrador work. It is always a great encouragement to us that friends think of us and are willing to show their interest and practical sympathy.

Since last summer, we have been busy here at Nain, building a new church. With our severe climate, a good, strong building for our meetings is absolutely necessary. Our houses here are built almost entirely of wood. Our old church, which was built in 1814, is nearly 100 years old. It is no wonder, therefore, that most of the timbers in the foundation are decayed and that the walls have given way in places, so that often during a gale we fear an entire collapse. The new church will soon be complete, and this autumn we shall be glad to move into the new premises.

In more respects than one, the new church will be an improvement on the old. In the former, the benches were without backs, and during the winter nights, light was derived from candles and the space was limited. The new church will have benches with backs, so that the worshipers can sit comfortably, and the lamps—a gift from a friend in London—will not only give a better light, but will also help to decorate the church. To our Eskimos, the new church is a great innovation; they call it "God's Igloo" (God's house). They have not seen anything better or more beautiful and they believe it to be the prettiest place in the universe.

We have no artisans here. Much of the work must necessarily be done by ourselves. Unskilled labor we are able to secure, as our people are only too glad to help, and several hundred dollars' worth of labor was thus furnished gratuitously.

Now our new place of worship is almost finished. In October we hope to dedicate it and we trust that God will manifest himself here unto us and unto those whom he has placed in our charge.

Our mission attends to the needs and requirements of the Eskimo race, but a few days ago we had a number of Indians here from the interior of the Labrador peninsula. Through the writings of Mr. Wallace, Mrs. Hubbard and Mr. Cabot, these natives have been brought into prominence of late, and indeed it is marvelous how they can exist, especially in winter, in so desolate a country. The reindeer or caribou furnishes them with nearly all necessaries, and they are experts in tanning and preparing their skins. But if the deer fail them while they traverse hundreds of miles in the dead of winter; while rivers are frozen solid and lakes are covered with a crust of ice six to eight feet thick; while snowstorms rage and frost holds earth and sky within its icy clutches, then is the time when these poor Indians find the odds against them to be as much as they can bear.

The New Republic

AS the smoke of the conflict in Lisbon lifts and the political atmosphere grows clearer, the causes that led to the dramatic transformation of the little monarchy to a republic, become more apparent. Misgovernment, official corruption, and recent widespread strikes among the industrial classes, gave additional strength to the revolutionary movement which had threatened to overturn the throne at the time of Carlos' assassination two years ago. The republicans, through an active propaganda, made such inroads at the last elections that the government realized the coming danger, but was powerless to meet it. Besides, as the sequel proved, a very large proportion of the army and navy was avowedly republican.

There was another complication, which doubtless helped to precipitate the climax. King Manuel was openly pledged to a liberal policy, but the Queen Mother secretly opposed him and favored the clerical party. It was known all over the capital that she treated Manuel like a child, and this knowledge, it is believed, emboldened the clericals to plot his dethronement in favor of Don Miguel de Braganza. If there was indeed such a plot, all the plans miscarried, for the revolutionary leaders, equally distrusting the liberalism of Manuel and the clericalism of Amelie, decided that the time was ripe for the finishing stroke which should sweep away the throne and give practical expression to the growing aspirations of the people for popular government and political freedom.

Whether the republic will live must depend largely upon the wisdom of the course to be pursued by the provisional government. Dr. Theophile Braga, who is at the head of affairs, is said to be a leader of high qualifications, and of political experience and influence—a man of middle age, respected for his honesty and integrity, his culture and his patriotism, and one, moreover, who is more likely to favor moderate than extreme measures. Manuel, the Queen-Mother Amelie and the rest of the royal fugitives are said to have fled to England. Had Alfonso been in his place, we should probably have seen that peppery young monarch planning to return with an army at his back, in an effort to regain the lost throne; but with Manuel such a thing is scarcely to be expected. Should Spanish republicanism break loose, spurred by little Portugal's example, we may see a startling transformation: not only a republic which would include the Iberian peninsula, but which, bounding the republics of France and Switzerland, might give a new and strange aspect to the map of Europe.

A Doubtful Comparison

FATHER BERNARD VAUGHAN, a noted Jesuit orator of England, has attracted considerable attention by his attacks on "the sins of society," his principal target being the "smart set" of the British capital. More recently he has been sounding a forewarning of the decline of the Anglican and Greek Churches, and now he has turned his oratorical batteries against Protestantism in general, which he pronounces decadent, chiefly in consequence of the attitude of the Protestant churches on the divorce question. He "points with pride" to the growth of the Catholic Church, predicting that it is to be the sole survivor in the great conflict of modern religions. Eloquent and able as this preacher undoubtedly is, he is strangely oblivious of the great internal strife now going on in the Catholic Church all over Europe and which is just beginning to be understood here. In France, Spain, Italy, Portugal and Austria that church is greatly divided. "Social Modernism" is only one of the many wedges that are splitting the ancient fabric. The Vatican's attitude toward the French society known as "Le Sillon" (the Furrow)—a social movement among the faithful for the advancement of the moral, intellectual and material welfare of the working classes—has done much toward alienating intelligent French Catholics, and has once more demonstrated the intolerance of the Vatican toward all attempts at social, political and economic progress. In Austria, according to the European press, there has been during the last decade a remarkable defection of not less than 55,000 persons who have broken away from Rome and enrolled themselves as Protestants. All the world is more or less familiar with the recent changes in Spain and those now taking place in Portugal, where the political and religious authority of Rome has sustained a severe set-back.

These and other indications would have influenced most orators to be more temperate in their language; but Father Vaughan has boastfully challenged comparison of the vitality of the churches, and yet has overlooked the essential fact that while in some lands there may be an apparent numerical increase, in others the power and influence of the Vatican—for ages dominant in Europe—has been effectually checked by the growing intelligence of the very people who were formerly its most loyal adherents.

Helping the Unfortunate

THE approaching cold season will make life hard for thousands in our big cities, and especially for the men and boys who have flocked to New York from homes in the country and in distant States, hoping to lighten the burden of the household and make a living for themselves. Disappointment is the lot of many of these hopeful hearts. They find everywhere competition in the labor market and they often go down, down, until the last dollar is spent and in their despair they appeal to the Bowery Mission. For over thirty years this mission has stood as a lighthouse for those unfortunates who have made shipwreck on the shoals of life. Some, but not all, have gone down through their own fault—they have yielded to weakness and temptation. Even these the Bowery Mission cannot turn away. If it did, what would become of them?

This is the special work of the Bowery Mission. Many a home in this land of ours is indebted to the influence of this Mission for the restoration of some one who has long been missed from the home circle, and who has sunk almost out of sight in the maelstrom of misfortune. Every season we receive many letters from fathers and mothers, and from wives, too, full of expressions of gratitude for what has been done towards helping their loved ones to find friends and employment. All these years, the Bowery Mission has been a practical almoner, a good Samaritan to thousands who have lost their bearings. It has cheered them, fed them, clothed them, encouraged and prayed with and for them. In this far-reaching work, which Dr. Klopsch and his associates have kept up continuously for nearly twenty years, we have enjoyed the cordial co-operation of thousands of God's people in many States.

If any reader of these pages could spend an hour in the Mission on some cold evening and see the hundreds of poorly-clad men and lads—age sitting side by side with beardless youth—and if they could but hear the testimonies of gratitude and the hopeful promises that fall from their lips, such a one would feel that a gift sent to this great work, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, though it may have seemed like "bread cast upon the waters," is sure to be returned in multiplied blessings.

Sunrise in Korea

HERETOFORE, practically all we have heard of Gospel progress in the "Hermit Kingdom" has come to us from the missionaries. Their glowing reports of the triumphal march of Christianity in that country are now fully corroborated by our American Consul-General, George H. Scidmore, who has just returned from Seoul, the capital, after thirty-four years' consular service, interrupted by only two brief furloughs. He describes the work of the missionaries as magnificent and as being the most striking feature in Korea's present condition. An effort is being made to keep politics out of the churches. He regards Korea as the most promising missionary field in the world. Buddhism, the old faith, is moribund and almost dead. Christianity and education go hand in hand and the people are eager for both. Six great missionary organizations are at work there and the Y. M. C. A. is doing its share in bringing about the general transformation. The people are literally hungering and thirsting for the Gospel, with education and Western civilization, and the native and Japanese authorities favor it. Many prominent Koreans, including the chief justice, have openly accepted Christianity and have become active members of the Church. Sunrise is brightening the hills and valleys of the ancient land with the promise of soon broadening into perfect day. Korea has now been absorbed by Japan, but without doubt, its new spiritual life will go on unchecked, and it may be the appointed means of helping in a great Gospel advance in the Mikado's empire.

A Faithful Steward

JOHN S. HUYLER'S name was almost a household word. He dealt in sweets and had an old-fashioned specialty which was a favorite with children and not disdained by their elders. Beginning long ago in a modest way, his great business expanded until its ramifications extended everywhere. But the aspect of Mr. Huyler's character which made him eminent and entitled him to world-wide honor, was not that of successful business, but of genuine Christian philanthropy. His name was a synonym for wise liberality. He invested his great wealth in good works. He never sounded a trumpet before him, yet there was not a university or college to which a poor and ambitious student might go, which did not appeal directly to his heart and hand. The young man or the young girl, toiling amid difficulties and hardships to secure an education, was sure of assistance, if the case were presented to John Huyler. Not only in large gifts but in a multitude of small ones, given quickly and unostentatiously, in answer to personal application, this good man served his period. He has gone to his reward, and has heard the voice of the Master saying, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Aiding the Missionaries

A GIFT entrusted to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to be divided among ten needy missions, was apportioned and checks mailed the same day to the following missionaries:

Gerard J. Schilling, LaPaz, Bolivia	$15.00
Frederick Jansen, Cebu, Philippines	15.00
Christian Schmitt, Nain, Labrador	15.00
Z. C. Beals, Wuhu, China	15.00
Matthias Klein, Akashi, Japan	15.00
Pandita Ramabai, Poona, India	15.00
Susan E. Haswell, Moulmein, Burma	15.00
R. Wodehouse, Umtali, Rhodesia, Africa	15.00
W. Hagqvist, Kienchow, Shensi, China	15.00
A. R. Stark, Callao, Peru	15.00

May this beautiful benefaction, given with a lack of ostentation which makes it all the more worthy, be richly blessed, both to the workers in these far-off heathen lands and to the thoughtful and generous giver at home.

Tragic Automobile Race

THE sixth automobile meet on the Motor Parkway on Long Island for the Vanderbilt Cup, was held October 1. It broke the record for speed and also for its fatalities, as four men were killed outright, and twenty persons seriously injured. Harry F. Grant, driver of the 1909 model six-cylinder, 60-horse-power Alco, entered by the American Locomotive Company, was the winner. His time for the 278.8 miles was 4 hours, 15 minutes and 58.34 seconds, an average of 65.1 miles an hour. Joe Dawson, driver of the 1911 model, four-cylinder, 34.1-horse-power Marmon, entered by the Nordyke & Marmon Company, was second. His time was 4 hours, 16 minutes, 23.51 seconds. John D. Aitken, driver of the 1911 model, four-cylinder, 40-horse-power National, entered by the National Motor Vehicle Company, was third. His time was 4 hours, 17 minutes, 29.74 seconds. Grant's time was a new record for the race. The former record average was 64.3 miles an hour, made by George Robertson in the 1908 race, with a 120-horse-power locomotive. Grant led Dawson by only 25 seconds; Dawson was a little over a minute faster than Aitken. Harry F. Grant got the cash prize of $2,000 for winning the Vanderbilt Cup Race, in addition to a number of prizes offered by automobile makers. Gelnaw got $1,000 for winning the Wheatley Hill Race, and Endicott $1,000 for winning the Massapequa Race. There were ten thousand automobiles and a perfect army of spectators at the race. The fun of the race was largely spoiled by the fearful slaughter which it caused. Crazy cars got out from control of their drivers and dashed like demons to their work of death. One of the city papers the next day required a whole column to record the names and descriptions of the dead and injured. The column began with the dead, Ferdinand D'Zubia, forty years old, of 330 Alexander Avenue, the Bronx, sales manager for the Pope-Hartford Automobile Company; Charles Miller, mechanician for Louis Chevrolet, driver of the Marquette-Buick car No. 29; Matthew P. Bacon, mechanician for Harold Stone, driver of the Columbia Car No. 12; Edward Lynch, seventy-one years old, of Glen Cove Landing. The International Automobile Race for the Vanderbilt Golden Cup is announced for October 15. There is a serious debate whether it will be run, as the fatalities are likely to be so great. The automobile race has fun in it, but it is at too great a price. The country is interested in the make and speed of these cars, for they have come to stay; but it ought to be more interested in the preservation of human life. One precious life is worth all the automobiles in the nation. Most of the legislatures and municipalities have made restrictions which tend very largely to protect human life and body. The mad frenzy of automobile races, so deadly in its consequence, should be stopped at once, if not by the automobile men themselves, then by the officers of the law. That frenzy reminds us of the damage of the chariots of old, referred to by the prophet:

Behold, his chariot shall be as a whirlwind; his horses are swifter than eagles. Woe unto us! for we are spoiled. (Jer. 4:13.)

Century Plant Blooms

Mrs. W. Snowdon Nichols sent a century plant from her conservatory on Staten Island to the Plaza Hotel in New York the other day, where it was given a place of honor on the clerk's desk. It had been preparing for a hundred years for the bloom which it was about to unfold. Soon after its arrival at the hotel, it began to open. Starting modestly, it gradually became a thing of beauty, perfectly white, except for a slight fringe of yellow around the edges. Hundreds of the guests of the Plaza, as well as visitors, thronged about the plant to admire its rare beauty. Among those who watched it were Baron Matsui of Japan and his two daughters. At noon it was in full bloom; at midnight it wilted and shriveled up. Things that are to live a long while take a long time for development. There are weeds that grow with a strong stalk and gaudy bloom, to be chopped down by the first hard frost. The oak that intends to live a hundred years takes a long time to mature. There are little creatures which come to their maturity in one day to die the next. But man with his possible four score years advances very slowly to the maximum of his power. The plants that live for centuries only suggest the beginning of our immortal life, whose flowers of truth and love shall bloom not once in a hundred years but shall be perennial and everlasting. The beautiful bloom of the immortal soul is a reflection of the Absolute Beauty which is God.

Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined. (Ps. 50:2.)

Cholera in Naples

The epidemic of cholera has attained alarming proportions in the city of Naples, where a hundred new cases and eighty deaths are reported in a single day. Cholera first appeared in Russia last May, and by the end of July had spread to forty-two provinces and territories of European Russia, resulting in 100,000 deaths. Several cases of the disease have appeared in different places in Germany and Austria. Last month the cholera crossed the Adriatic to Bari and soon spread over the coast of southeastern Italy, reaching Naples. The authorities at Naples, thinking that the discovery of the disease in their city would injure business, concealed the facts or misrepresented them, letting the people die like flies with the epidemic and publishing that they had died of some other disease. Being unable longer to conceal the fact, the municipal and government authorities have set themselves earnestly to the task of fighting the epidemic openly. Thousands upon thousands of people, of course, have fled from the city, and there is great danger that many foreign ports, including our own, may admit the contagion unless the strictest measures are at once used to prevent the pestilence. The misrepresentation of Naples will cause the death of thousands of innocent victims. The plague following the penalty of their deception reminds us of the leprosy that fell upon Gehazi for telling the lie to the prophet Elisha.

The leprosy therefore of Naaman shall cleave unto thee and unto thy seed forever. And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow. (II. Kings 5:27.)

First Chinese Senate

The late Dowager Empress, one of the ablest women of modern times, and one of the most wise and skilful in statecraft, promulgated a plan of representative government in China, which involved nine years of progressive action. The first step in the plan was taken a year ago by the inauguration of the provincial assemblies. The second step was the opening of the Imperial Senate by the Regent Prince Chun in Peking on October 3. There was little or no ceremony to mark an event memorable in the world's record. In a brief address Prince Chun said that the wish of the people was for a parliamentary government and he commanded the Senators to have that end in view. A magnificent parliamentary building will be constructed, but pending its completion the sessions of the Senate will be held in the narrow quarters of the Law College. The crown is determined that progress toward representative government shall be orderly and conservative. Of the two hundred members of the Senate, one hundred were appointed by the throne, the other hundred by the provincial assemblies. But these men elected by the assemblies were not permitted to qualify until their selection had been approved by the viceroy of their province. Those named by the throne include Imperial Manchu princes and nobles, distinguished scholars, representatives of the official class, and of the wealthiest citizens. This Imperial Senate is expected to demonstrate the ability of the Chinese people to share in the rulership of the empire, and hence prepare the way for the third and last stage of governmental reform laid down, the establishment of a national parliament which has been promised for 1915. We who live to-day cannot possibly realize the momentous revolution which is going on in China in the interest of the people and especially the common people. Jesus Christ, the great Lawgiver, taught the world how to make laws and govern men, and all nations have caught his spirit of liberty and love, and are obedient to his commands. Christ's teaching has made representative governments, and representative governments in turn have promoted the establishment of his kingdom. God only knows how the increased liberty given to the people of the world by representative governments has promoted the ushering in of Christ's kingdom in the earth. What was said with reference to the individual can truly be said with reference to the nation:

If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed. (John 8:36.)

Hundred Miners Killed

By an explosion in a No. 2 coal mine, of the Mexican Coal and Coke Company, near Esperanza, Mexico, about a hundred miles south of Eagle Pass, Tex., the other day, a hundred miners lost their lives. The list of dead and missing numbers 129. Many who were killed were Japanese. The story of the disaster is told in a few words, but the tragedy of a hundred precious lives sacrificed and the sorrows that pierce the half thousand survivors, cannot be contained between lines of ink or measured by any earthly arithmetic. We look for certain massacres amongst savage tribes, but the useless slaughter of our civilized times is appalling and criminal. There are certain necessary perils of civilization, but they should be reduced to the minimum. They certainly have not been in this country. It is one of the commendable tendencies of the times that the lives of citizens, especially those that work with their hands, are being better safeguarded by law, by human enterprise, and by the spirit of humanity. Within the past year or two, almost every State in the Union has enacted laws protecting the lives of the wage-earners and providing for their families in case of disaster, which is as it should be. Such accidents as the death of the hundred in the mine remind us of the injunction of the wise man:

Boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth. (Prov. 27:1.)

Teetotaller Mayor of London

Thomas Vesey Strong was elected Lord Mayor of London the other day without opposition. He was born in 1857 and in 1900 married Lillie, the eldest daughter of the late James Hartnoll. Sir Thomas was educated privately, and is credited with being a self-made man. He is a widely known temperance advocate and enjoys the distinction, it is claimed, of being the first total abstainer ever chosen as chief magistrate of Britain's metropolis. Bad as the drinking habit is in England and America, there is a marked improvement in temperance sentiment in both countries, which has its expression in a pronounced teetotaller as mayor of the largest city in the world, and a total abstainer as the President of the United States. The mayor of London is in harmony with the Scriptures, which say:

It is not for kings to drink wine, nor for princes strong drink; lest they drink and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of any of the afflicted. (Prov. 31:4, 5.)

The Shame of Our Municipalities

Sixth Article of the Series on "Our Country, Its Laws and Its People"

By E. R. JOHNSTONE

SHOULD you ask a succession of your American friends, "What do you regard as the greatest danger to our government?" you would probably receive diverse answers.

One man would tell you our greatest danger lies in the concentration of wealth or industrials in the hands of individuals or of corporations.

Another would regard sectionalism, the jealousies and misconceptions between the East and the West, the North and the South, as our most imminent hazard.

A third would sigh over the advance of Socialism and the trend toward anarchy manifest in many quarters.

A fourth would grieve, and justly, over the constant differences between capital and labor.

Ask a well-informed foreigner who, like Bryce, has made a study of our conditions, and the chances are he will tell you our gravest apprehensions should be aroused over our continued and conspicuous failures in the governments of our cities.

There is not a foreign writer of note who, commenting on conditions in the United States, has failed to point out that in respect to honesty, efficiency and decency our cities make a painfully poor showing when compared with those in Europe.

Our Great Urban Population

No country in the world has as many cities in which the adult males are factors in the scheme of government, as has the United States.

In the census of 1900 out of a total population of 76,148,576, the urban population was 28,411,698, or 31.1 per cent. of the whole. The urban population was sectionally divided as follows:

North Atlantic Division	13,613,736
South Atlantic Division	2,049,520
North Central Division	9,343,213
South Central Division	1,896,655
Western Division	1,469,268
Hawaii	39,306

In the decade 1890-1900, the urban population showed an increase of 2 per cent. In the decade 1900-1910, it is believed by many statisticians, the increase will be twice as great, making the proportion of city dwellers in this country 35 per cent. of the whole, or, figuring on a total of 90,000,000, more than thirty-one and a half millions.

The divisions above given show that urban population is far greatest in the Northern and Northern Central divisions — that is, it is densest in the richest, the most highly educated, the longest settled parts of the Republic.

If you will take a list of our cities and ask the sociologist or moralist who has given the matter close attention (as many have), "How many of these are well governed—as well governed as Glasgow in Scotland, Berlin or Hamburg in Germany, Manchester in England, The Hague in the Netherlands, Vienna in Austria, or Paris, France, for instance?" and he will be constrained to answer, "Not one."

Some of Our Civic Scandals

Lincoln Steffens, who has been busy for years in showing to the public the shame of our cities, says in a preface to one of his books: "I cut 20,000 words out of an article on Philadelphia and then had not written half my facts." It is impossible in the space of this article to hint at a tithe of the scandals that have attached to our city governments. A few may be specified to point the moral—the tale cannot, alas, be in any wise adorned.

There is not a city of more than 100,000 inhabitants in the United States, and the next census expects to show fifty such, that has not been investigated as to the probity of its officials. In many of the places, which will readily come to mind, the investigations have been officially authorized by legislature, grand jury or aldermanic resolution. In others they have been by private committees politically provided or instigated by civic reform bodies, clergymen or defeated candidates.

I do not recall a single instance in which the investigation completely exonerated the responsible heads of government. In every case, so far as I can discover, thievery, corruption, graft was shown. Sometimes the offenders were petty officers and the peculations small, but all over the land it has been a question of degree, not of kind.

Aldermanic Chamber—Investigating Graft

The most conspicuous investigations within the last decade have been in New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, San Francisco, Chicago, Minneapolis, Pittsburg and Cincinnati. The names of Lexow, Folk, Heney and Gibboney will recur to publicists and readers of newspapers. Much good has been accomplished, but more on the lines of public enlightenment and temporary betterment than on those of permanent remedy.

Scotched, Not Killed

Hundreds of snakes in the civic grass have been scotched, but all too few have been killed. Many have revived to bite the heel of decency, to poison the body politic.

In St. Louis in nine conspicuous cases one official was acquitted of graft on a technicality and eight were convicted. Not one of the eight went to jail. The higher courts reversed or nullified the verdicts.

Statistics of trials and convictions or acquittals are not obtained without expenditure of time, money and labor that no one has, as yet, seen fit to make. I have been at some pains, however, to get a few indicative figures. By queries of newspaper men, by letters to prosecutors and by search of press files I learn that within the last two years there have been forty-two trials of conspicuous offenders, of men prominent as political bosses, mayors, treasurers, comptrollers, aldermen or the like. Of the forty-two not one has spent any time in a penitentiary, though there were twenty-seven convictions out of the forty-two indictments.

Seven of the indicted left their country for their country's good, eight have regained much of their former prestige and power and six are dead. It is a satisfaction to know that only three of the number—and it must be understood that these figures are not totals but suggestive cases—seem well-to-do. Quite a number have so far fallen from their high estate as to be without either property or honor in their land.

Evils That Flow from Civic Misgovernment

An ex-boss is on record as saying that the American tax-payer would rather be cheated than make a fuss, and the fatal "Oh; we'll get along somehow" is one of the stiffest obstacles the real reformer has to overcome. It is doubtless true that the average dweller in American cities has only the faintest conception of what dishonest municipal government means to him and to his family and his pocket. Among the civic evils that flow as naturally from a corrupt and incompetent government (the one always includes the other, directly or indirectly) the following may be indicated:

Heavy taxes and illicit or unwise expenditures, with gross extravagance as a necessary accompaniment.

Bad or insufficient public facilities in respect to water, light and transportation. When the grafter is in the saddle or is the power behind the urban throne, contracts are not let nor are franchises granted so that the public most affected shall be most benefited. It is always a case of "addition, division and silence." The beneficiaries are the public service corporations and the crooked councilmen. How many thousands did typhoid from impregnated water kill in United States cities last year? Nobody knows for certain—everybody knows the total would be appalling if certified. How many lives are lost each year from defective drainage, flimsy construction, defiance of health laws? Impossible to guess, yet proper civic rule would preclude violation of building laws. Favoritism is always at the bottom of laxity in law's observance.

Gambling, drunkenness, loose living, crime against persons and property. Evil officials need evil supporters at the polls. Evil support can not be gained by law's enforcement.

Grinding poverty. City money stolen, funds "grafted" upon officials' bank accounts, could have been, should have been, devoted to public improvements. Public improvements mean work for laboring men and work means wages.

Worst of all: Continued evil in municipal government means perpetual lowering of the standard of public morals. The more bad men flourish the more good men grow discouraged, discouragement leads to decay and decay to death of decency.

Who Are to Blame?

Who are to blame for the failure in government outlined — who to blame for the continued ascendancy of unmoral leaders, thieves and incompetents?

You are, I am!

It has been contended that there never was a business panic in the United States of the last generation that was due to economic conditions. Every depression has followed a "lack of confidence among business men and manufacturers."

Whether this is true or not, it is the fact that every instance of bad government in the cities of this country is due to "lack of confidence, or lack of care, among the voters."

There are more than six millions of city voters in the United States of to-day. We know that a majority, a vast majority of these are decent

BIBLE WORK ON ANDEAN HEIGHTS

Indians in Arequipa

Llamas on the Heights of the Andes (14,000 feet)

A Chilean Convert and His Family

PERU has inexhaustible mineral wealth in its wonderful mountains. Some one has described it as a nation of beggars sitting on ags of gold. This purely commercial standard, hich determines a country's wealth by the riches f its mines, is hardly the true way of reckoning. he supreme need of Peru to-day is not more miners o dig out the inexhaustible wealth in the veins of he Andes, but an army of witnesses to roclaim the power of the spiritual and he incomparable value of an eternal oul.

The Bible seller, wherever he goes, as sought to make men understand the alue and responsibility of this talent. onely heights have been scaled, perils nd hardships faced in order that the Book of books might be placed in lonely nd distant huts on the elevation of the ndes. Mothers in the home, children n the street, men in the market have ll heard the blessed news of free sal-ation.

Here is a glimpse of Bible traveling n the Andes, across the southern rail-ays of Peru to Lake Titicaca and uzco. Starting at Mollendo on the acific Coast, the track skirts for a few iles the sandy beach, washed with oam to the sound of the swish of the reakers. At Ensenada, the steady limb up the Andes begins. Now we re crossing the Pampa de Islay, with ts medanos (sand crescents), where ever a blade of grass grows; further p, we thread the edge of precipices verhanging the Rio Chile, and by even-ng time we are whirling our way hrough the fresh green campiña of Arequipa. From Arequipa, we rapidly scend the western slopes of the Andes, iewing Misti, Piche-Piches and other eaks from ever-varying positions. We eakfast at Pampa de Arrieros, the old osada of the arrieros (drovers) of the Andes before he railway was built. Passing Vincocoya, the volcano Ubinas, from whose subterranean fires columns of moke ascend, is in full view. At Crucera Alta (14,666 feet) the ridge of the Andes is reached. Majestic peaks rise from the ramparts of the Andes nd a wide range of vision discloses itself before the yes of the traveler. The air is clear and pure, but too rare for many. By 7.30 the train pulls up at Puno, on the shores of Lake Titicaca, an inland sea embosomed in the Andes, 12,500 feet high.

We are now traveling across the Great Central Puna of Southern Peru, a huge mountain-girt plain walled in on either side by the Andes. Over it are scattered Indian huts and villages and flocks of sheep, llamas and alpacas, kept by the Quichua Indian shepherds. About three P.M. the train reaches La Raya, on the edge which forms the water-shed. Here the waters flow east and west and the mighty Amazon can be gathered up in a bucket at its most remote source.

The First Open-Air Gospel Meeting in Callao, Peru, August 28, 1910

At Sicuani we see the Quichua-speaking Indians gathering from leagues around for the weekly market, their llamas laden with the produce of the soil. There they squat across the market plaza by the thousand, as they must have done years and centuries ago, dressed in all the varied shades of the rainbow and sitting solemnly under their broad-brimmed sombreros, masticating their quid of coca. Heaped beside them are their bundles—the rough homespun cloth and strange-shaped hats, small bundles of wool, sacks of corn, barley, quinua and chuño, pots of chicha, the favorite Indian drink, coarse bread and coarser Indian pottery. Indians bartering with their Spanish-speaking conquerors; Indians patiently waiting to sell a few cents' worth; half-tipsy Indians and Indian children rolling and tumbling in the gutters; stately llamas marching with more merchandise—the scene of a by-gone age.

The hills are bathed in all the glory of the sierra sun, as the train draws up at the station of Cuzco. Cuzco, once the proud Athens of the West, the city of the Incas, the seat of romance, is still largely the city of the Children of the Sun. All around us are the mighty bulwarks of the ruined fortresses, past glories of the dusky sons of the Incas whose sun has long since set in gloom and despair, and whose only hope and comfort must be in the rising of the Sun of Righteousness who shall be unto them an everlasting light.

The Bishop of Cuzco, looking at a well-bound New Testament, said: "This you give to me."

"Señor Obispo, we do not give away our books, but sell them," is the reply.

"This is the Bible," responds a fellow-traveler; "I have never seen one before. I have often heard that it is a great book." On the way to the gold mines far down the Beni, a young man said: "I take it as companion to the lonely forest region." An hacendado from the valley of Tambo, after perusing a copy, replied: "I want this to read in the evenings on my sugar estate."

At Huaqui, a small place, six different nationalities bought Bibles. It was very touching to see a dear little girl, the daughter of a Finn, learning John 14 and "Gentle Jesus." We ask the prayers of mothers and children for these little ones.

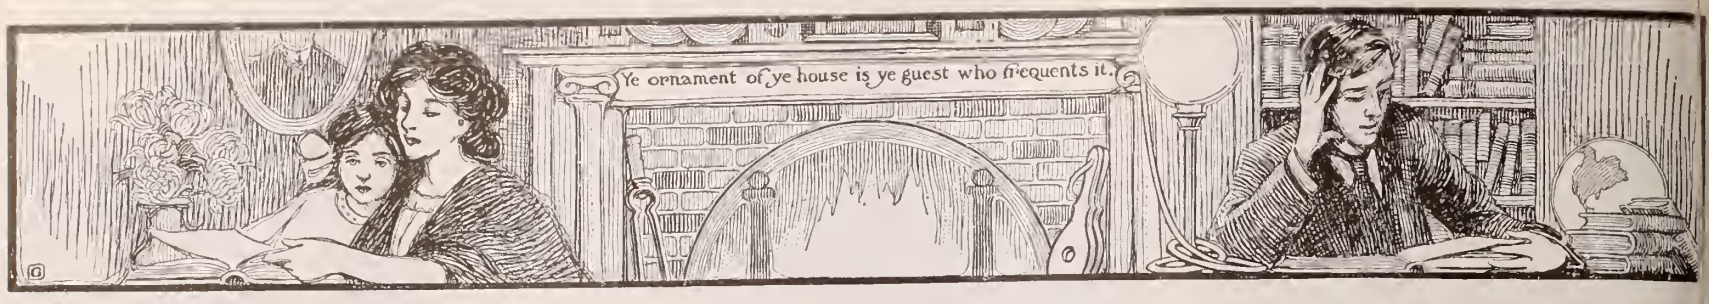
AROUND THE OPEN FIREPLACE



Women in Council

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE women who form our CHRISTIAN HERALD circle of interested and enthusiastic friends do not all live in our country. They are scattered over the globe. Every issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to homes in the Far East, to South America, to various parts of Europe and to places remote from the great centres, as well as to those near the publication office. By "near" in this connection is meant anywhere on the Atlantic coast, in the South or the Middle West. We are a great company of women, we who meet every week in this page, and it is pleasant to think that we are bound together, not only by love for each other, but by love and loyalty to our Lord and Saviour.

Our first letter this week comes from Persia, and is written by a friend who is nearly eighty years old. Sight and hearing are both impaired, but she is able to read and she never fails to welcome the visits of her favorite CHRISTIAN HERALD. Only a part of her letter can be given.

A Pupil of Fidelia Fisk

"My time for usefulness is over, but I take much interest in the articles I read. Would that I could translate them into our Syriac. I loved this work some time ago. Mrs. Labaree, our missionary lady, does such work as this for our Syrian women. It comes to my memory as I write to you a picture of Miss Fidelia Fisk, our beloved teacher, in her schoolroom sixty years ago or more. For half an hour every day she talked to the pupils, warning of many things at home and abroad. They made a deep impression on our minds. She was like a queen as she sat on the platform. I cannot write more. May the name of our Lord Jesus be praised.

"SARAH OSKANNA."

Mrs. Oskanna is the oldest living graduate of the school founded by Fidelia Fisk. To her work in the East Miss Fisk carried the spirit of Mount Holyoke Seminary, in which she had been a pupil under Mary Lyon.

Ninety Years Young

The next letter comes from a still older gentlewoman, whose home is in Indiana. She begins by saying: "I am a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family. I have taken it ever since it started. I am now in my ninetieth year. My father and mother both died young. Father was sixty-one and mother nearly fifty. They had eight children, of whom I was the second. I was married sixty-five years ago in Nebraska. My husband died nearly two years ago. I make my home with my oldest son. Two years ago I had a fall, and since then I have been a cripple. All the exercise I get is by taking the back of a kitchen chair and pushing it like a baby. I spend much time in my pleasant room, in which part of the furniture was purchased more than fifty years ago. I have a Testament with large print; I read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the daily paper. I like to keep in touch with what is going on in the world.

"MARY R. M."

Why should not a keen-minded and sympathetic woman of ninety enjoy keeping in touch with the active stirring world of to-day? The body only grows old, not necessarily the heart and mind. Underneath the mask of age the oldest of us feels young.

While Waiting for the Doctor

In these days of the telephone it is generally easy to summon the doctor without delay, and physicians are quick to respond to a hurry call. Still, there is often something to be done before the doctor comes. If a person is fainting she should be laid down in a recumbent position, with the head slightly lower than the body. If a child has a fit, a hot bath is the instant resource and one should be given immediately. If poison has been taken by mistake or otherwise, administer an emetic. Melted lard, tepid, of course, warm water or mustard and water are excellent for producing the nausea that expels poison from the stomach. Never lose your presence of mind, or permit yourself to be frightened in cases of accident or sudden illness. If you do not know what is to be done call upon the nearest neighbor, having first summoned your doctor without waiting to see what may happen to the patient.

ONE LITTLE FISH

One little fish will not furnish a dinner,
Still we have had a pretty good time.
Never mind, lads, though the fish be the winner,
Trying and losing is really no crime.
People who fish depend largely on luck,
The outfit they need is patience and pluck.

LEND A HAND

LIFE is full of weary struggle, men go down for lack of cheer;
Oft the mist is in their faces, and they see no comrade near.
In the strife for bare existence earth is as a desert land,
Say the word that rings with courage; lose no moment; lend a hand.

"Hello!" send it through the darkness as you swing the lantern high.
"Hello!" Sound it like a signal; "Hold your own, for help is nigh."
To the tired burden-bearer on the sea, or on the land,
You, to whom life's joys are given, do you utmost; lend a hand.

If you see a fellow-pilgrim tempted when the flesh is weak,
Yours the timely aid to render; yours the needed word to speak.
Leave him not alone to battle; at his side make loyal stand;
In the name of Christ our Saviour, help your brother; lend a hand!

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Who Is the Head of the Family

WE all know the usual answer to the question. We all know as well that in different families the case differs according to temperament, disposition and possibly fitness for that one of the ruling powers who takes and keeps the helm. Some clever critic has said that in Germany the husband is the head of the household; in France the wife; in England the oldest son; in America the eldest daughter. This generalization awakens a smile, but so far as the last clause is concerned does it not approach the truth as we find it here? The pretty daughter is easily sovereign of her father's heart. The American husband is so chivalrous and devoted to the interests of wife and family that he is happiest when working for them and providing the means for their comfort and luxury. One is always surprised at discovering an exception to this rule. Such a character as Mrs. Henry De la Pasture delineates in her novel, The Tyrant, or as Anthony Trollope described in He Knew He Was Right, is almost unknown in this land of ours. The real despot, sweet, loving and lovable, is the girl in her teens whom her mother indulges and her father adores. One constantly hears an apology made for this or the other neglect or omission. "We consulted Angeline or Constance and she advised us to do so and so." Ah! well, one of these days the daughter may in turn, in a home of her own, yield her sceptre to somebody just like herself. Thus the world goes on.

The Portrait of a Selfish Man

In his latest book Mr. William de Morgan, with the consummate skill of genius, has drawn the portrait of a thoroughly selfish man. In his preceding romance, It Never Can Happen Again, he showed us a woman so lost to womanly gentleness and so hardened in selfish ambition that she had not one redeeming trait. In Sir Oliver Raydon Mr. de Morgan has shown us what selfishness can do to make a man demoniac in the pursuit of passion, cruel, rapacious and without a vestige of human feeling although he may have the traditions and training of a gentleman. An Affair of Dishonor is well named and well worth the reading, although it differs wholly in style and treatment from any of the author's previous work.

Those who have watched the course of Mr. de Morgan, whose first work in literature was published when he was sixty-five years old, must regard him as the foremost genius of the period. Before undertaking the writing of novels Mr. de Morgan had won distinction in another field of art. The present book flashes back a light on the days when people believed in witchcraft and were ready on the slightest accusation to burn a supposed witch at the stake, drown her in a mill pond or otherwise torture her to death.

Emperor William's Bible

On the eve of a recent banquet in Berlin, says the official Nordeutsche Zeitung, his Majesty Emperor William had been reading the Bible. "I like reading the Bible often," said the Emperor. "The Bible stands on the shelf at my bedside and I have underlined many a passage in it." The Hamburger Nachrichten quotes the Emperor as saying further that he can not understand why so many people occupy themselves so little with the Word of God. "In all my thoughts and actions I ask myself what the Bible says about the matter. For me it is a fountain from which I draw strength and light. In the hours of uncertainty and anxiety I turn to this great source of consolation."

Look Out for Salt With Gypsum

Government tests show that every table salt, save Shaker, contains considerable gypsum.

In shaker Salt we remove the gypsum by a costly process which is ours alone.

Gypsum is plaster of Paris—the basis of gravel and gall stones. A dangerous substance to go through such organs as the kidneys, liver and spleen.

Yet you get this gypsum in every table salt save Shaker.

Salt That Flows

Shaker is the salt you find at every fine restaurant—the salt that always flows freely.

No shaking, pounding and poking. Tip the shaker and out comes the salt—even in the dampest weather.

The shaker box is made of wood fibre covered with paraffine. It is proof against all contamination—dampness, odors, germs and dirt. Note the convenient patent spout.

10 Cents Per Year

Think what salt is worth—salt that doesn't clog, salt that is sanitary, salt free from gypsum.

Yet the cost only 10 cts. per year over common bag salt—soggy, coarse and unsanitary.

Sold by all good grocers for ten cents per box (east of the Rockies). Simply say—Shaker Salt.

MA HIGGINS' GIFT

By SUSAN M. GRIFFITH

MA HIGGINS' voice, raised in song, filled the little room with melody as she went about her work.

> Looking this way, yes, looking this way.
> Dear ones in glory, looking this way,
> Fair as the morning, bright as the day,
> Dear ones in glory, looking this way.

This was one of Ma Higgins' favorite songs. The reason, not so much because it is a beautiful song in itself, but because almost all of Ma Higgins' dear ones were in glory, and she believed that they were looking this way for her to come, too.

Aside from this, Ma Higgins was one of those cheerfully constituted persons with whom life itself is a song. Sometimes it even swelled into a hallelujah and a "grand amen." If she had her "rainy days," and times of sorrow, no one knew anything about them. She took them into her closet and "shut the door," and talked to her Father about them. Then she came out and went to singing again.

Ma Higgins had passed through "deep waters" during her seventy years of life, too. A husband and six dear children had gone before her to the "promised land." She had never known what it was to have an easy time, but had toiled and scrimped and saved always. Her ability to work had grown less and less year by year, until now there was nothing left but the poorhouse for dear old Ma Higgins. Indeed, she was actually beginning to pack up her few cherished belongings to go there in a few days at the farthest.

A pretty young girl with bright, kind eyes and face flushed with surprise and perplexity, stepped upon the threshold of the open door.

"Why, Ma Higgins, whatever are you doing?" she exclaimed, in a displeased tone. "I ran over to ask you over to our house for dinner to-morrow, and here you are, tearing up and looking as if you were getting ready to move. Luella is coming from Centre with the new baby and we want you! Now, Ma Higgins, you're not going away?"

"Not until next week, deary, and I'll be proud to come and see the new baby and eat dinner with you. I'm so thankful I can have this beautiful treat to wind up with. It will live in my memory always and keep my heart in the right place in a grateful attitude, deary, for I have so many uncounted blessings—so much to be thankful for, and God is so good."

"But—but, what does it all mean, Ma Higgins?" said the young girl, her brown eyes filling and her lips beginning to quiver.

"Well, deary, Ma has come to the end of her means and must give up her home. But it is nothing. The dear Lord provides for his poor. I have another home to go to, thank the blessed Christ.

> "It may not be my way,
> It may not be thy way.
> But in his own way
> The Lord will provide,

"And he has, deary, he has."

"Ma Higgins," exclaimed the young girl breathlessly, you do not mean—you cannot think—of going to the—poorhouse?"

Ma nodded. Her dear old eyes were filled with tears, but she blinked them bravely back. "Why, yes, deary, I do. It is my Father's home for me, and it is a good one and I am thankful for it, so thankful. It came to me this morning—such a glad feeling that I live in this age of philanthropy and benevolence. Think how it used to be in Christ's time and before. The poor had no resource but to beg then. Now, the religion of Jesus has made everything so different. Nice homes and a plenty to eat and wear; in sickness one is tenderly cared for, and there is nothing to worry about. And I was just thinking, as you stepped in, what a grand chance I shall have to do some work for the Master. You know how seldom I can get out to church here, but they have a nice chapel there built in the house, and preaching every Sabbath! And there are little children there that I can gather into a Sunday class and teach them of Jesus, and I can read and sing to the sick, and oh, a whole lot of little things like that that don't count much except to Jesus. He can do so much with such small service, and it comforts me to think of it; it does!"

Little Maybelle Lewis stood and stared. She had often heard people speak lovingly of "Ma Higgins' thankful gift," but she had never dreamed what it is to possess such a gift. She couldn't bear it; she was all broken up. "Ma Higgins," she cried in a choking voice, "I want you to hush! You must not talk that way. The poorhouse is no place for you, and you must not think of going there. I can't have it; I can't, I can't!" And, with that, she burst into tears and fairly ran out of the house.

Rushing into her own home, she fairly fell upon the family with her news, and in ten minutes her mother and sister were crying with her, and her father was walking the floor in great excitement.

"Ma Higgins going to the poorhouse! Why, it can't be! It must not be! It shan't be!" exclaimed Mr. Jeremiah Lewis vehemently. "Why, we can't spare Ma Higgins! She is a regular institution. We'd miss her cheery face at the window, and her singing, and I'd like to know what this town would do without Ma Higgins' thankful gift! Why, it keeps everybody in a good humor and looking on the bright side. Why, she'll pick a sunbeam out of the blackest cloud. Oh, dear me! dear me!"

"Why, she's thankful for the poorhouse, just think!" sobbed Maybelle.

"The idea!" said Mrs. Lewis. "Well, there's nothing like a sweet, contented spirit. Ma Higgins is richer than the most of us after all. If——"

"Just hold on!" interrupted Mr. Jeremiah Lewis, stopping before his wife and daughters and shaking a huge forefinger in their very faces. "Just you listen to me! Ma Higgins isn't going to the poorhouse! Now mind that! She is—not—going—to—the—poorhouse!"

There was a general merchandise store in the village where the men loafed and talked and read the papers. "Utley's" was the name it went by, and to Utley's strode Mr. Jeremiah Lewis with his news. After going through the story as tragically as possible, and eulogizing Ma Higgins to everybody's satisfaction, Jeremiah cleared his throat and fixing a compelling eye upon a man of small stature and wizened face, he said:

"Where is that old house of your's, Smith, that you moved to the back of your lot when you built?"

"Sitting there yet," said the old man with a twinkle in his blue eye as he puffed away at his pipe. "Want to buy it, Jeremiah? Me'n the boys have been talking of tearing it down, come spring."

"No, I don't want to buy it, and I don't want you to tear it down," said Jeremiah, with a ponderous shake of his forefinger in his direction. "What I want you to do, is to let Ma Higgins have it to live in. If you'll give her the house we other fellows'll turn to and bring her wood and coal and things to eat. I'll give her a sack of flour when she needs it, and Jennings here can give her potatoes, and Butch Baker'll hand some meat over the counter for her, I know, and the women'll bake her a loaf and a pie, and we'll get her along. It won't be more than fair to make her some return for what comfort she's given us. Now, I tell you! The folks have asked her over to the house for dinner tomorrow, and while she's there, a lot of us will get together and bring her sticks of furniture over and set 'em in the old house, and when she gets ready to go home, why, she'll go home. See?"

"Yes, yes!" said the men excited and eager; "it'll be a fine joke on Ma. Go ahead, Jeremiah! W'll follow like a lot of sheep. Anything for Ma Higgins!"

Well, the programme was carried out to a finish; and when Ma Higgins was escorted to her new home she stood speechless at sight of the bright fire burning in her old stove, the homely old carpet tacked tight to the floor, and the old clock ticking cheerily on the mantel. Mr. Jeremiah Lewis stepped forward and led her to her old cushioned rocker, saying:

"Now, Ma Higgins, this is your poorhouse; and you ain't going to be allowed to fret nor worry any more about anything. You are our Ma, and we are your loving children, whose duty and pleasure it is to take care of you. All you have to do is to keep us straight, and break up our grumbling with your thankful gift. And—and—God bless you, Ma Higgins."

Ma Higgins tried to respond, to say something beautiful in return, but she could only lift imploring hands to heaven and breathe out: "Bless the Lord, oh my soul, and all that is within me, bless his holy name."

And every one of the men uncovered their heads, and every soul in that beautiful presence breathed a fervent "Amen."

"Pollard Day" in Bavaria

IT was Judge William Jefferson Pollard of St. Louis, Mo., who devised the now famous "Pollard pledge," which has swept around the whole world.

Judge Pollard believed that there might be better ways of reforming drunkards than sending them to the workhouse. He determined to try one method which had occurred to him. He accordingly made the next drunkard who appeared before him promise to refrain from drinking for one year, and to report to him twice a week during that period, with sentence hanging over him if his pledge were broken. It worked well and the judge has used it in thousands of other cases, with a ninety per cent. record of success.

Not every drunkard can be so dealt with. Some are so brutal that unconditional sentence must be passed upon them; but with the vast majority of such offenders, it has proven effective.

The "Pollard pledge" has become a law in Vermont. It has even been enacted into a law by the British Parliament. Australia and New Zealand are contemplating its adoption, and so are many other countries.

The German Federated Temperance Societies have just had a great meeting at Augsburg. They set aside September 30 as one to especially commemorate the wonderful plan of the distinguished St. Louis reformer, who was their guest of honor.

A NEW AID TO FIRE-FIGHTERS

During the recent forest fires in the West a short time ago, the automobile proved itself a valuable aid to the fire fighters. By the use of the auto, groups of rangers, soldiers and other fire-fighters were rushed from one danger point to another in much quicker time than could be done with horses. The machines could also go further into the danger zone and were used for rescue work and carrying dispatches in the burned sections.

Noted Philanthropist Gone

EW names were better known in America in connection with large bevolences than that of John S. H ler, who passed away at his summ home at Portchester, N. Y., Octobe1. He was born in New York City in1846. He was educated at the pu ic schools and, when a young man, le ned his father's business—that of ba ng. After a short time, however, he tarted a business of his own, manuf turing candy. He was successful fr n the beginning, and within a few ye s his business increased rapidly ar he began to amass a fortune.

ealth flowed in upon the young m , but he did not view money as m y do, as a means to pleasure and se gratification, but rather as affordin increased opportunities of doing go to others. For many years, a la e part of Mr. Huyler's income as th head of a successful corporation wa devoted to numerous charities and to arious enterprises for church exte ion.

r. Huyler was an ardent Methodi Several years ago, when the Tw ntieth Century Thanksgiving M ement was started, he subscribed $1,000 for its furtherance. He gave la ely to foreign missions and toward cl ing church debts, building new ch ch edifices and supporting rescue mi ions. He was one of the principal pa ons of the old Water Street Missi for many years, and was instrumental in the establishment of the new Wley Rescue Hall on the Bowery. He gave $25,000 toward the erection of Methodist church in Harlem, in an talian neighborhood. On one occa n, when he was late for a meeting of he board of directors of Syracuse University, he surprised his fellow-m bers by tendering a gift of $20,000 to ake up for his delay in attending. He was one of the principal supporters of he Methodist Theological Seminary at Madison, N. J., and was the "good angel" of many small western Methodist colleges and schools, and of not a few belonging to other denominations than his own.

But there were many charities to which Mr. Huyler contributed generously, where his gifts were unknown to the general public. It was his greatest pleasure to help individuals and worthy but struggling institutions, and to do it privately and with no blare of trumpets. He took special delight in "doing good by stealth," and he cared nothing for worldly appreciation. Nor did he stick to denominational lines in his benefactions. Hundreds of individuals and many weak and poorly supported churches, missions and schools have been the recipients of his private gifts. One who knew him well speaks of this phase of Mr. Huyler's character in these words:

"So little is really known of his charities that it is hard for many people to appreciate the extent of them. He was the most modest man I ever knew about these things. It was always his wish to give another chance to the fellow who was down on his luck. The cases in which he made mistakes were few and always attributable to human nature. The recipients always seemed to be deserving, and it was a great satisfaction to him that they rarely disappointed him."

Mr. Huyler was a deeply religious man and had strong spiritual convictions. His religion was broad enough to embrace all denominations and everything that stood for practical Christianity. He was a warm friend of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and sympathized actively with many of its philanthropic enterprises, and he was a close personal friend of its late proprietor, Dr. Louis Klopsch.

Mr. Huyler is survived by his wife and four sons, David, Frank, Coulter and John. He was associated with many large business interests other than the corporation of which he was the head, including banks, manufacturing companies, etc. His death is regretted, not alone by Methodists but by a very wide circle of friends, acquaintances and beneficiaries throughout the country.

"Especially Prized"

I am more than pleased with the Red Letter Testament. It is the first of the kind I've ever owned, and this one is especially prized because of the part Dr. Klopsch took in its arrangement. Although the first anniversary of my birth into THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family is not quite here, I fully and deeply realize the loss we sustain in not having him among us; yet, for his sake, I think the family ties will go on strengthening more and more.

Swetnam, Va. MRS. D. O. KNIGHT.

Give the Advertiser a Chance

WE received a letter recently from one of our subscribers who called attention to statements made in an advertisement which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, holding them to be manifestly untrue. It happens th we are well acquainted with this advertiser and have every confidence in th claims made. We so replied to our subscriber and advised her to write the advertiser for detailed information, which would show that the claims were true. Instead of doing so this subscriber again wrote us, reiterating her lack of confidence and insisting that the claims could not be true even though we had co dence in them.

This certainly is a very unjust attitude. To condemn an advertiser without fir having proven his statements untrue is hardly the attitude which one would ex ct from a CHRISTIAN HERALD subscriber. We have found our subscribers to be air-minded in the extreme and very willing to give the advertiser the benefit of ny reasonable doubt. Of course this is an isolated case, but we have thought we to call attention to it for what it is worth. Subscribers should at least giv an advertiser a chance to prove his case without condemning him unheard.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, wh must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of he appearance of the advertisement.

Moisture Will Spoil Ordinary Soda Crackers

NO matter how good the ingredients or how careful the baking, once expose soda crackers to the slightest dampness of air and they lose their taste and much of their food value.

That's why bulk crackers kept in barrels, boxes and cans get tasteless and tough and hard to swallow. They absorb moisture, and they also gather dust, germs and store odors. What a pity that this most nutritious of flour foods is so contaminated!

But there is a soda cracker too good, too perfect to be thus treated! After baking, Uneeda Biscuit are immediately placed in dust tight, moisture proof packages which preserve their crispness, flavor and nourishment.

MANY uninformed people seem to imagine that we send missionaries to the heathen simply because we think our religion is better than theirs, as a theory and a rational belief.

They say, "These poor heathen are happy. Why do you disturb them in their peaceful enjoyment? They do not send missionaries to try to overturn your religion. Why can you not be as considerate of them?"

Reply to such opposition with the humanitarian argument. Say to the scoffers, "We do not try to extend Christianity merely because it is a beautiful and reasonable argument, but because it produces, if consistently practised, the highest type of human being that has yet been conceived of. The unselfish, loving, just-minded, pitiful Saviour is a model unapproached among the ideals of all other faiths. It is the desire to make men everywhere like unto him that has nerved to their desperate work the noble missionaries of the Cross."

Dr. John Van Nest Talmage, for forty years a faithful missionary in South China, said, "We noticed in walking through the villages that very few girls were to be seen. The custom of binding girls' feet would account partly for this, but the disparity between the number of girls and boys was so great that we inquired the cause. Those whom we asked answered with laughter, 'We kill most of our female children.' The result of this practice upon the morals of the people may readily be imagined. It accustoms the mind to cruelty and wickedness in forms that are never dreamed of in Christian countries."

This was years ago, but at the great Rochester Convention of 1910, Miss Osborn of Foochow testified that in spite of the edicts which have been issued to forbid infanticide, "not five minutes' walk from the mission at Foochow is a baby-tower often overfull of bodies of little girls, not all of whom are dead when thrown in."

"Truly," adds Miss Osborn, "nothing affects these inhuman customs but the Gospel of Christ."

That is why we send out missionaries.

Professor Beach said at Rochester, "Opium smoking, gambling, untruthfulness, foulness of speech and every form of personal immorality are appallingly common in China."

Therefore we are trying to save these wretched people from their sins by sending them missionaries.

Miss Holliday of Tabriz, Persia, tells of men who can (as is usual in heathen countries) divorce their wives at pleasure and marry again. "Oh, the bitter anguish of a Mohammedan woman's life!" she says.

It is to alleviate such suffering that we send out missionaries.

"The Hindu religion," said Dr. Richter at Rochester, "is responsible for the burning of widows, infanticide, child marriage, the disabilities of widowhood, polygamy and gross excrescences of superstition."

It is to banish these evils that we send out missionaries.

"In Blantyre," said Dr. Richards of South Africa, "a man was sold for two yards and a woman for six yards of cloth and a human life was worth nothing. To-day more than a million human beings in South and East Africa believe in God."

And this belief, implanted by our martyr missionaries, has rooted out slavery and made the life of a man as precious as the golden bars of Ophir. Strengthen the hands of our missionaries, who are striving to lighten the darkness of barbarism with this greatest light ever given to men—the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Th king is criticised as giving almost as ttlehid to monarchical cnuses as to the ro sistas, whose professed attachment to is jiesty can only, it would seem, be main- ain on condition that they alone be allowed o govern, and that in any fashion they may hoo It is stated that the king's lack of orce n political affairs is accentuated by ubl suspicion that his private life has been apic losing him the good esteem of the itize. Because of the weakness displayed y t court pnrty, it had been believed in anyquarters that the revolution could effect a rpose with little opposition. Evidently poical overturn has been looked for by pen wealth in Portugal. Many landed pro- riet and capitalists are said to hnve been akin a transfer of their securities to other puntes and otherwise prepnring for it.

Th boy king, whose life was shad- wed by the memory of his murdered ath and brother, had an unhappy eig He had constantly before him he ival tragedy of February 1, 1908, whe King Carlos and the Crown rin, Luiz Filippe, were murdered n Pa do Arsenal (Arsenal Street) n fu view of the gay crowds of holi- ay ght-seers. Even in his palace, Manl never felt secure from the ons rator or the lurking assassin. Almt nightly, there were arrests in he ighborhood of persons suspected f h ing designs upon his life. His ealt was honeycombed with rebellion. He red not show himself abroad nle well guarded. His young face as ready seamed with the lines of are nd trouble. Dread of assassina- ion as ever present in his mind dur- ng t two years and seven months of is happy reign.

Th recent elections gave evidence f t growth of the opposition by etur ng many republican members to Parl ment. The republican press had frequent attacks on the mon- rch Recent attempts to temporize with the opposition resulted in failure. It was at this critical juncture that certain events occurred which helped to precipitate the crisis. As a nation the Portuguese are loyal to the Vatican, but like the Spaniards, they are moving steadily toward social, civil and political freedom. On Tuesday, October 4, Professor Bombarda, a prominent republican and anti-clerical who had only recently been elected as deputy, was shot by an army officer and died the following day. He was a distinguished educator and scientist. He had been director of the Lisbon Insane Asylum and only recently had thrown himself into politics in aid of the republican and anti-clerical propaganda. When the news of his death became known, the excitement was intense. Crowds gathered in front of the dead deputy's house, shouting: "Down with the priests!" Crowds of armed revolutionists, who had been storing rifles and ammunition for months, suddenly appeared in many places. It needed but a spark to light the tinder, and set the whole land aflame. It is said that large quantities of arms had been smuggled across the Spanish border, in readiness for the Lisbon uprising.

Dr. Braga, the provisional President, is known as "the wise man of Portugal." He is a man of much culture, a poet and general litterateur, about sixty years old, of excellent family and well to do. For many years he has been instructor in the University of Columbra, the oldest and best in Portugal. He has been an active defender of republicanism against the monastics (or clericals) for three or four years past and is thoroughly familiar with the political needs of the country and people. His associates are all men of character and standing.

Grave fears are entertained lest the success of the Portuguese revolution should be followed by a similar movement in Spain which might result in transforming the entire peninsula into a republic. While the Spanish army is believed to be loyal to King Alfonso, the influence of the republican triumph over Manuel's government may prove too powerful to resist. General Weyler is said to have made all preparations for the forcible suppression of any republican attempt in Alfonso's kingdom, but the anniversary of Dr. Ferrer's execution, which is near at hand, causes much foreboding.

Alaska's Wealth in Coal

THE minimum tonnage of the great coal lands of Alaska, thus far surveyed, is stated as follows by a writer in the Independent:

	Short tons.
Anthracite	1,611,700,000
Semi-anthracite	517,000,000
Semi-bituminous	1,492,000,000
Total high grade	3,621,400,000
Bituminous	18,500,000
Sub-bituminous	4,060,300,000
Lignite	7,404,300,000
Total low grade	11,483,100,000
Grand total	15,104,500,000

These estimates cover only 1,202 square miles, which with reasonable certainty are underlaid by workable coal beds.

If the same tonnage per acre prevails throughout the 12,667 square miles which are mapped as coal fields, it will be seen that the minimum tonnage of the Alaska coal fields should be placed at 150,000,000,000, and perhaps at many times that amount. It is worthy of note that these figures indicate for Alaska a probable supply far in excess of Pennsylvania's original deposits, with this difference, that all of Pennsylvania's coal is of high grade, while over half of Alaska's is lignite.

One Dollar
Puts the "RICHMOND" Suction Cleaner In Your Home

One Dollar puts the "RICHMOND" Suction Cleaner in your home.

One Dollar forever frees you from brooms, mops and dusters—and the backaches and drudgery they bring.

One Dollar forever stops the expense and the nuisance of Spring and Fall housecleaning.

One Dollar enables you to do, easily, by electricity, the worst work a woman has to do.

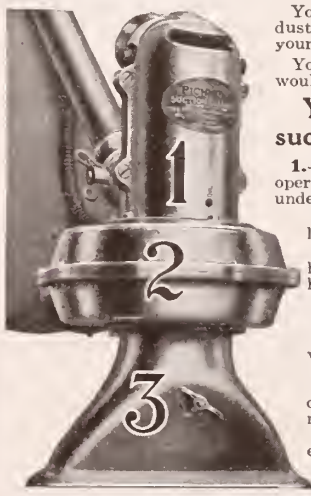
And One Dollar is the only cash outlay.

It will bring you the "RICHMOND" Suction Cleaner complete—ready for instant use.

The balance you pay for month by month out of the actual money you save.
For Vacuum Cleaning is the greatest of all household economies.
You are paying the price of a suction cleaner, right now—whether you have one or not.

You are paying its price out in twice-a-year house-cleaning alone—for a "RICHMOND" makes house-cleaning needless.

You are paying its price out—many times over—in the hard labor of sweeping and dusting which the "RICHMOND" makes unnecessary.



You are paying its price out again and again in the damage which dust does to your furniture, to your carpets, to your hangings, to your clothing—to YOU.

You are paying the price of a "RICHMOND" when a single dollar would save the waste.

You see here the lightest and simplest suction cleaner ever designed.

1.—is the motor, not a "stock" motor, but one built expressly to operate the powerful suction fan to which it is directly connected, under

2.—a suction fan which embodics the best of all that was learned in two years of steady, scientific experiment.

3.—is the suction nozzle, which is pushed over the surface to be cleaned—or to which can be attached a twelve-foot hose for high wall, drapery and upholstery cleaning.

Nothing to Wear Out

There are no gears, no diaphragms, no valves. Nothing to wear or to jiggle loose.

The complete machine weighs but ten pounds.

All that any vacuum cleaner or suction cleaner can do, this one does. And it does, besides, some things which no other machine can do.

You can, for example, use this "RICHMOND" Suction Cleaner either with or without the hose.

For use with the hose, we furnish, special tools for cleaning portieres, walls, books, bedding, upholstery, clothing, hats.

For Hair Drying

Also a special attachment for hair drying, pillow renovating, etc.

The hose attachment slides on and off with the same ease that your foot slides into an easy slipper.

Slip on the hose and the ten-pound "RICHMOND" rivals any machine—no matter how much it weighs or how much it costs.

Slip off the hose, and you have a floor machine which compares favorably in weight with an ordinary carpet sweeper—which sweeps on both forward and backward strokes and glides over the floor without pressure.

Advantage of Light Weight

The "RICHMOND" Suction Cleaner enables you, now for the first time, to clean by electricity without lugging a sixty to eighty pound machine from room to room—upstairs and down.

It represents as great an advance over heavyweight vacuum cleaners as these cleaners represented over brooms and carpet sweepers.

But light weight and easy operation are but two of the "RICHMOND'S" exclusive superiorities. There are many more.

The Vibrating Brush

There is, for example, the vibrating brush, which you find in no other machine.

This brush fits in the floor nozzle of the "RICHMOND." It vibrates at the rate of 10,000 times a minute. Not a rotary motion to wear the carpet, but a light up-and-down tapping motion.

Taps Out the Dirt

The vibrating brush taps the caked dirt out of the carpets and fabrics which no other machine could clean.

The brush slips in or out without the use of tools. It is but the work of ten seconds to take it out or put it in.

And without the brush the "RICHMOND" will do all that any machine—vacuum or suction—can possibly do without working injury to even the finest fabric.

Simplest Construction

We could multiply comparisons endlessly.

But without saying more, you can judge our confidence in the "RICHMOND" by the fact that we do not only cover it with the broadest possible guarantee, but we give you besides a full year to pay for it.

Saves its Own Cost

If convenience and perfect cleanliness were worth nothing; if it were worth nothing to put an end to the backaches of sweeping; to the drudgery of dusting: to the bugbear of annual house-cleaning—if all these were worth nothing, remember this: The "RICHMOND" Suction Cleaner will pay its own cost and Earn You a Profit besides from the actual month-to-month money it saves.

Guaranteed One Year

Surely you must see that the "RICHMOND" Suction Cleaner must give perfect service, perfect satisfaction, day after day, month after month, else we could not afford this offer. Snip out the Dollar Coupon and send to-day to

Honoring Jesus by Service*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THERE is a terrible contrast to be drawn between an alabaster box of precious perfume and a purse having in it thirty coins of tainted money. One was the sweetest that the world has ever known, because it was given out of love and self-sacrifice to the Lord Jesus, and the other was the vilest the world has ever known, because it was the price of blood, even the blood of the Lord Jesus. Mary of Bethany; Judas Iscariot; the first the loving friend of Jesus, the second his bitter enemy, but both in his presence at the feast given by Simon, the aforetime leper. And what they did occurred in the little town of Bethany, in the home of Simon, at the time of the feast. Jesus was on his way to the Passover in Jerusalem and he was stopping for a few hours of rest in the house of Mary, Martha and Lazarus. (As we saw that house in 1904, it was mostly in ruins.) An invitation came from Simon for those in the Bethany home to come with their guest to a feast in his house. It was the night before Jesus made his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. "Coming events cast their shadows," it is said. Certainly there were dark shadows over there in Jerusalem at the time of the feast in Simon's house, for in the court of the high priest Caiaphas were gathered the chief priests and elders of the people taking counsel together how they could secure the person of Jesus and kill him, for they thought that he would be in the city at the time of the Passover. It was dark and terrible in Jerusalem, the atmosphere reeking with hate. In Bethany, at the feast, it was sweet with love, because of Simon, whom Jesus had cured of his leprosy, and of Lazarus, whom he had raised from the dead. Martha was there as a loving friend and neighbor to help in the serving of the feast, and Mary was there as the loving learner. But, alas, there were some dark shadows, even in Bethany, for Judas was there!

The Gift of Mary

Mary had brought a gift for Jesus, but she kept it hidden until the time seemed fitting to give it to him. The gift was in a small alabaster box that might easily be covered with two hands. It contained twelve ounces of attar of roses; that represented the essence of 4,800,000 roses, as 400,000 roses were required to make one ounce. Oh, yes, it cost something; three hundred Roman denarii, representing a man's wages for one year. The box was tightly sealed, so that none of the precious perfume should escape, but Mary broke the seal before she gave it to Jesus. In Matthew's Gospel we read that she poured the perfume on the head of Jesus, and the same in the Gospel of Mark, but in John's Gospel we read that she poured it upon the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair. (Matt. 26: 7; Mark 14: 3; John 12: 3.) Let us conclude that she poured a part on his head and a part on his feet. It was altogether an act of humble and submissive reverence for Jesus on the part of Mary. She had so often sat at his feet and learned of him that it was most fitting she should include his feet in the anointing. It was not altogether an unknown thing to do, but it was not common; it was practised only to show great respect, and the most expensive materials were used. There were other occasions of anointing, as a part of religious services, and for kingship, and sometimes for health, when it was hingled with prayer for the restora- on of the sick.

Some were at the feast who mur- ured against Mary's action, and we re sorry to know that the objectors ere the apostles—not all of them, erhaps, but some of them. We are lad that their names are not men- oned, only that of Judas. Possibly e alone spoke, while the others were mply indignant. Judas said: "Why as not this ointment sold for three undred shillings (denarii) and given the poor?" And these ugly words ere spoken in an atmosphere all veet with the rose-perfume! We can most see the surprised and pained ok on the face of Mary as she anced toward Jesus for vindication. nd Jesus did vindicate her in no un- rtain manner. "Why trouble ye the oman?" he said to his apostles; "for he hath wrought a good work upon e." And then he added: "She hath hointed my body beforehand for the rying." (Mark 14: 8.) And so sus referred to the custom of the ws to anoint and embalm the dead fore burying. That was a solemn oment for the guests at the feast. hey knew then that Jesus was look- g death in the face. He knew that t six days should pass before his ath on the cross.

The Reward for the Gift

Then Jesus immortalized Mary by ying, "Verily, I say unto you, where- ever this Gospel shall be preached in e whole world, that also which this oman hath done shall be spoken of r a memorial of her. She hath done hat she could." If anywhere in the orld we could find the grave of Mary would be our delight to place over it whitest marble her figure, in her nd the box of precious ointment, in e act of breaking the seal; and on e base of the statue we would have t the commendatory words of Jesus: he hath done what she could."

Not only did the perfume fill the me of Simon, but it has filled the hole world, and it will last for time d eternity. Many persons have en inspired by that act of Mary, not ly to serve Jesus with more love, but o to express loving kindness for ir friends, not waiting until they e dead to show their appreciation. neral wreaths and emblems are od in their way, but the sad part of is, those upon whom they are be- wed are beyond such expression. hile living upon earth a knowledge how much their friends thought of em might not only have made life eeter, but it might have strength- ed them to live longer.

The Judas Price

The sequel to the feast in Simon's use was that Judas left and went to the chief priests, and said, "What e ye willing to give me and I will iver him unto you?" And they ighed unto him thirty pieces of ver (fifteen dollars). And from t time he sought opportunity to iver Jesus unto them. What Judas then and afterward has been oken of against him in the whole rld; in this again contrast him with ry. Artists have tried to repre- t Judas as he must have appeared a Simon's feast. In an old painting Florence, Niccolo Frumenti pictures h in this scene with a most diabolical e ression of grudging malice mingled vh scorn. Raphael represents him aleaning across a table expostulating vh angry mien and covetous face. l the Oberammergau Passion Play, t representation of Judas strangely aeals to one as the development of h covetousness is shown. Judas did n all at once become the betrayer of Christ. It took many months if not a of three years to work himself into tl fiend that he was. He began with sishness. We can easily imagine tlt as a boy he always wanted his o n way, which developed into a love o power as he grew to be a man. And then he coveted money as he discovered that it gave power. When chosen to be one of the twelve apostles, it followed that he desired the office of treasurer, and he was appointed to it, a most unfortunate circumstance for him, as his avarice grew day by day in handling the funds, small as they were, given mostly for the relief of the poor. At Oberammergau we saw the face and form of Judas becoming possessed with a grasping expression; his muscles becoming drawn and tense, and his face shadowed with a sinister look—his very movements becoming stealthy. He did not realize the change that was going on in himself, but he had at length come to a full realization of it when he brought back the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, saying, "I have sinned in that I have shed innocent blood," and he cast down the thirty pieces of silver in the sanctuary and departed. At Oberammergau the silver was thrown down with a ring that caused a shudder to go through the audience. That money was so tainted that the priests did not dare to gather it up and replace it in their treasury; but they used it to buy a potter's field in which to bury strangers. The visitor to Jerusalem to-day is shown that same potter's field, now covered by a convent.

What Judas Had Heard

Judas as an apostle heard all of Christ's discourses about the curse of covetousness. He heard Christ say: "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." He heard the warning against the deceitfulness of riches, and unfaithfulness in the unrighteous mammon. He heard the exhortation to make friends for eternity by right use of the mammon of unrighteousness, that is, of this world's goods. He heard the parable of Dives, miserably rich for a while, and miserably poor forever. He heard all these warnings, but evidently he did not apply them to himself. There is no sin more common than covetousness, and none so seldom recognized. If a man is intoxicated, it proclaims itself in his feet, in his lips, and in his face. The man himself can hardly fail to recognize his vice, but whoever heard of a man confessing that he was covetous? The nearest to it was a man who on being censured for giving so little to the church, replied: "You have no idea how hard it is for me to give away anything, or you would not blame me so much." When one discovers this trait in himself the thing for him to do is to fight Satan in his heart by determining on a campaign of generous giving to several good causes, and to keep it up through life. A man placed a dollar on the church collection plate, and immediately heard a voice within saying: "Fool you are to give as much as that." "I will have my revenge, devil," he said, and so after the service, he went to the front and laid a five-dollar gold piece on the same plate beside the dollar he had already placed there.

Judas' good name did not save him from becoming a bad man. Where did he get his good name? Why, his mother gave it to him when he was born. She called him "Judas," which meant "Praise—praise of God." She named him so because she thought he would grow up to be a God-loving, a God-serving man. Perhaps some of us have always thought that "Judas" must be a very bad name, at least we have never heard of any mother who named her child after him. Let us hope that the mother of Judas was not living when he betrayed Christ.

Judas said to Jesus: "This ointment might have been sold for much and given to the poor" (verse 9). Jesus replied: "Ye have the poor always with you, but me ye have not always."

Gentlemen: Since purchasing my first Ostermoor Mattress of you, sixteen years ago, I have bought several others and have recommended them widely.

NEW YORK, June, 20, 1910.

Gentlemen:

Ostermoor Mattresses and Cushions have always given me entire satisfaction in every respect, and proved all you claimed them to be.

Their use throughout my yacht Aloha was such a comfort and pleasure, and we found them so much better than the very best of hair, we would use nothing else but Ostermoor Cushions throughout, and Ostermoor Mattresses in all the staterooms of the new Aloha.

Very truly yours,
ARTHUR CURTISS JAMES.

IT is a conspicuous fact that there are many imitations of the Ostermoor Mattress, and of Ostermoor advertising, but not one of them imitates Ostermoor by offering proof of service.

They can't do it! They haven't the service back of their goods to show. We defy any other mattress maker, regardless of name, material or price, to show letters from users attesting that after fifteen to fifty years' service their mattresses are as comfortable as when new.

Think of this when you buy a mattress, especially if you are shown an imitation which is said to be "as good as Ostermoor."

Think how much better it is to get a mattress that is built for everlasting service and comfort, instead of simply stuffed, and likely to develop soon into a mass of sleep-disturbing lumps and bumps.

Ostermoor is the cleanest, most sanitary, most comfortable of all mattresses. It is dustless, germ proof, vermin proof, proof against odors and dampness. It never needs remaking or renovating, except an occasional sun bath.

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

J. E. C., St. Louis. In I. Sam. 17: 12, David's father had eight sons. In Sam. 16: 10, 11, David was called after Samuel had rejected seven. In I. Chron. 2: 15, David was the seventh son. Please explain.

David's brothers, according to Josephus, the Jewish historian, were: Eliab, Animadab, Shammah, Nathanael, Rael and Asam. It is a conjecture or tradition presented by the Jews that another son (none other than Nathan, who afterward became the prophet) was adopted by Jesse, making up the eighth.

W. A. I., Painesville, O. Of what is the best stucco made used in covering buildings?

Stucco is usually made of pulverized marble and gypsum.

Mrs. M. O. T., Hart, Mich. Of what use is the Apocrýpha? Why is it put in the Bible?

The Apocryphal writings, although excluded from the Canon, are valuable for many reasons. The Old Testament Apocryphal books form a collection of literature which is interwoven with Jewish history at certain important periods. Some of these excluded writings have a historical foundation; others possibly deal with legend and tradition and superstitions. Several are of a high literary standard. The Apocrypha of New Testament times includes a number of books which scholars would regret to lose from their libraries, among them being the "books of Hermas," the Epistles of Ignatius and Clement, and the Acts of Pilate.

S. C., Portsmouth, N. H. 1. Is the triple alliance still in existence? We used to read much of it a few years ago. 2. What nations compose it?

1. Yes; the alliance is still in existence. 2. It is composed of Germany, Austria and Italy, and was aimed at France and Russia. It was formed in 1887.

A. B., Cartele, N. Y. What is the American foreign policy?

Our foreign policy must of necessity vary in accordance with the way in which international questions arise and their importance. We do not desire to extend our territory by conquest with that as the object. We stand for peace whenever national honor will not be injured and our rights abridged. We stand for the protection of our citizens when abroad. We do not interfere in the domestic affairs of foreign countries. Under the Monroe Doctrine we have set ourselves up as the guardian of the weaker nations in North and South America.

R. E., Milford, Conn. How many vice-presidents have become presidents through the death of the president, and who were they?

Five vice-presidents have become presidents through the death of a president. John Tyler succeeded William Henry Harrison; Millard Fillmore succeeded Zachary Taylor; Andrew Johnson succeeded Abraham Lincoln; Chester A. Arthur succeeded James A. Garfield; Theodore Roosevelt succeeded William McKinley.

M. H., Newport, Vt. How is the word abattoir pronounced? Is it an English word for a slaughter-house?

It is pronounced a-bat-war. It is a French word which has been taken into the English vocabulary and is now in good use.

L. G. McL., Halifax, N. S. What is Greek fire made of?

It is not known what the true Greek fire was made of. It is thought by some that its principal ingredient was naphtha. It was thrown from engines said to have been invented by Callenicus, an engineer of Heliopolis in Syria in the seventh century, when he tried to destroy the Saracens' ships. A so-called Greek fire made of a solution of phosphorus in a bisulphide of carbon has been tricd since in warfare. The Greek fire used in ordinary fireworks is a mere name given by the dealers.

I. A. M., Wick, Pa. What is the present number of representatives in Congress?

There are 391 representatives in Congress and seven delegates from territories. A new apportionment will be made based on the census of 1910.

A. M. F., Elyria, O. How many square miles are there in Germany over which Emperor William rules, and how many States would it take in the Union to make a realm as large as his?

The total area of the German Empire is 208,810 square miles. It must be remembered that while the Emperor is head of the Empire, there are several kings, dukes and other rulers who still rule over their States and have their separate houses of deputies or representatives. The Emperor is also King of Prussia and Prussia has 134,603 squares miles. The Empire is a confederation of German States with the hereditary Kings of Prussia being the imperial line. As our States are not of uniform size it would be better to take the extent of German territory and compare it with some section. Its greatest length is 830 miles; its shortest is 196 miles.

A. W., Saratoga Springs, N. Y. 1. Is baseball, as now played, strictly an American game, or did we get it abroad? 2. Is it played anywhere else than in America?

1. Baseball is purely an American game and is made up from old-time American games, "one old cat" and "two old cat." The first permanent club playing it was the Knickerbockers of New York in 1845. 2. It has been introduced by Americans into other lands, but it is played but little outside of the United States and Canada.

D. H. S., Ionia, Mich. 1. Did Christ give a direct command to pay a minister salary by any other than a free-will offering? 2. Is the basement of a church as much the house of God as the audience room above it? 3. Does the Bible teach that there will be animals in heaven?

1. He laid down no arbitrary rule on the subject. What the Saviour said when he instructed his disciples was suited to their needs and to the conditions of the work at that time. See Matt. 10: 10; Mark 6: 8; Luke 9: 3 and 10: 4. See also Luke 22: 36; Luke 10: 7. It is wrong to attempt, as some have done, to distort Scripture on this subject for controversial purposes. 2. In the ancient temple, there were certain courts held as more sacred and exclusive than the outer courts; yet the latter were a part of the general structure. 3. There is no Scriptural teaching on the subject.

E. A. H., Woodstock, Vt. When was alcohol first discovered and by whom, and what was it called at that time?

Hydrated alcohol or pure spirit of wine is said to have been obtained in the twelfth century by Abucasis by distilling fermented liquors. We do not know what name he gave to his discovery.

M. A. O., Toronto. 1. Is Mayor Gaynor of New York a Roman Catholic, or what church does he attend? 2. Do ex-Presidents of the United States receive any pension, and if so, what is the yearly allowance paid to ex-President Roosevelt, from the fact that he once was President, and what was his salary when President?

1. Mayor Gaynor of New York and his family are members of an Episcopal Church in Brooklyn. 2. Colonel Roosevelt is the only living ex-President of the United States and he receives no pension. There is no provision made for a pension to a President on his retirement from office. Colonel Roosevelt received a salary of $50,000 a year. In the latter part of his term he was voted $25,000 a year for traveling expenses.

R. P., Ontario, Canada. Was the city of Detroit ever the capital of Michigan? If so, when?

Detroit was the capital of Michigan from 1837 to 1847.

O. D., Davenport, Ia. Is it true that a member of Parliament cannot resign his seat?

Yes; but he can leave by getting an appointment to some office and then resigning that. There is an estate called the Chiltern Hundreds which belongs to the Crown. The stewardship of this with a salary of $120 a year is given to a man who wishes to leave Parliament and does not wish or cannot get a higher office. This he resigns. The legality of the method has sometimes been brought into question.

H. Y., Calais, Me. How high is the Eiffel tower in Paris?

The tower is 985 feet high.

O. M. F., Baton Rouge. How is the facial angle measured in anthropology?

The angle is contained in a line drawn from the middle of the ear to the edge of the nostrils, and another thence to the ridge of the frontal bone.

Mrs. D. L. R., Santa Rosa, Calif. I would like to know about the "Golden Rose" which was given to Queen Isabella of Spain and also to Empress Eugenie of France, but which in both instances preceded their downfall.

It is a cluster of roses and buds, all of gold and of beautiful workmanship, and in the cups among the petals the Pope at benediction inserts a drop of amber and musk. It is bestowed during the ecclesiastical year on the royal lady whose zeal for the church has been most in evidence. If no one merits the gift it is laid up in the Vatican. In 1868 the Pope gave the rose to Isabella of Spain in reward of her "faith, justice and charity," and her "high virtues." It was also given to Eugenie of France. The custom had its origin with Gregory the Great, reformer of the calendar. It is said that, instead of conveying fortune and happiness to those who receive it, it is a talisman of evil and that misfortune follows in its wake.

McL., Bennettsville, S. C. In a recent Sunday School Lesson, "The Parable of the Sower," in comments on the lesson in the gist of the lesson by Professor Torrey, he says: "The great sermon of this lesson was preached in the open air, so was every other sermon recorded in the Bible." Was the sermon by Peter on the day of Pentecost preached in the open air?

Evidently not, for it is clearly stated (Acts 2) that the sound "of a mighty wind filled the house where they were sitting." Tradi-n says that they were in the same "upper om" where the disciples had met daily since eir return from Olivet. Some early writers njectured that they met in one of the temple urts, but this is improbable.

F., Rahway, N. J. Upon what ground do we claim the right to fortify the Panama Canal?

By virtue of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 01 and the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty of 1904. e first was based on the Suez Canal treaty, t omitted the seventh article of that treaty, hich says that "no fortifications shall be ected." This omission, it is claimed, is tan-nount to a permission. The Hay-Bunau-rilla treaty provides specially that we shall ve the right at all times, on our discretion, to e our forces or to fortify, to protect the nal.

The letter of A. B. C., Leavenworth, Kan., ently printed in THE MAIL-BAG, telling of a ung girl of that place who has a twenty-ars record of unbroken Sunday School attendance, has attracted the attention of many readers. Mr. Daniel Miller, a Sunday School teacher of Reading, Pa., writes: "There is in my class in St. Paul's Reformed Sunday School in this city a lady who commenced attending school when she was several years of age and has not missed a session in 38 years. Her name is Mary Simon. Her teacher has just completed 50 years of church membership, and during this time was never prevented from attending communion services in church. Dr. Joseph L. Leinberger has just completed 50 years of service as superintendent of the First Reformed Sunday School at Lebanon, Pa. The event will be celebrated by the church and school on Sunday, October 9. The writer, who is now 67, commenced attending this school 53 years ago."

Mrs. Henry Binley, White Plains, N. Y., writes: "A friend of mine, Miss Jennie C. Powers, of Germantown, Pa., commencing when about two and one-half years of age, in 1908 completed her thirty-third year of Presbyterian Sunday School attendance without missing a Sunday."

These are phenomenal records. We doubt whether they can be eclipsed anywhere.

N. W., Council Bluffs, Ia. Is it polite and the proper thing for persons to read other people's postal cards that chance to fall into their hands? Has not the poor or the hurried person who uses the card as much right to protection from impudent curiosity, as the person who pays more postage?

In a general way, the person who uses postal cards does not pay for the same privacy that one does who uses a closed letter. It would be unreasonable to expect that a mass of open correspondence could pass through many different hands without being read by some; but it would certainly be in bad taste for any one to make a habit of reading postals or talking of their contents. Those who desire absolute privacy should use a sealed letter.

Mrs. P. J. P., Jr., Mount Pleasant, S. C. 1. Please explain Gen. 1: 7. What is meant by the firmament? 2. Also Matt. 10: 28. Whom are we to fear? Is it meant God or ourselves? 3. Is it lawful for persons of other denominations to stand sponsor for a child in the Episcopal Church? 4. Do Unitarians reject the doctrine of the atonement?

1. The passage is interpreted to mean that God "prepared the firmament." The atmosphere had already been brought into existence by Divine will, and it was now cleared of the dense mists which previous to the second day had surrounded the globe. 2. The corresponding passage in Luke 12: 4 is rendered, "Fear him, who is able," etc. 3. The sponsor must be a member of that church, a communicant and a baptized person. There may be exceptions, however, where these qualifications are not insisted upon. 4. They believe that man is not corrupt and ruined by nature, but undeveloped and incomplete. They assert that Christ was purely human, but call him at once the "Son of God" and "Son of Man." They believe him to be a Supreme Teacher and a Saviour in the sense of leading men to better, purer, nobler lives.

A. T., Berkeley, Calif. What are the honey-eaters?

Honey-eaters are passerine birds found in Australia and some of the islands of the Pacific. They have long slender bills and protrusible tongues by which they are enabled to extract honey from long-tubed flowers.

U. V. K., Northpoint, Pa. 1. Jesus was in all respects "tempted as we are, yet without sin." He in his humanity, was subject to the same trials and he could feel pain, weariness, hunger and sorrow. 2. The mind has great influence over the body, yet it cannot protect it from the results of a violation of nature's laws. Thinking cannot add to one's stature, nor can it ward off the logical results of accident or exposure.

COFFEE WAS IT

People Slowly Learn the Facts.

"All my life I have been such a slave coffee that the very aroma of it was ough to set my nerves quivering. I pt gradually losing my health but I ed to say 'nonsense, it don't hurt me.' "Slowly I was forced to admit the truth d the final result was that my whole rvous force was shattered.

"My heart became weak and uncertain its action and that frightened me. nally, my physician told me, about a ar ago, that I must stop drinking coffee I could never expect to be well again. "I was in despair, for the very thought the medicines I had tried so many nes, nauseated me. I thought of Postum t could hardly bring myself to give up e coffee.

"Finally I concluded that I owed it to yself to give Postum a trial. So I got package and carefully followed the rections, and what a delicious, nourish-g, rich drink it was! Do you know I nd it very easy to shift from coffee to stum and not mind the change at all? "Almost immediately after I made the ange I found myself better, and as the ys went by I kept on improving. My rves grew sound and steady, I slept ll and felt strong and well-balanced all e time.

"Now I am completely cured, with the l nervousness and sickness all gone. In ery way I am well once more."

It pays to give up the drink that acts some like a poison, for health is the eatest fortune one can have.

respectable, honest, patriotic. They loathe thievery in the abstract; they do not seem to recognize their power to prevent it in their local régimes. It is simply astounding to note how careless and unreasoning good citizens are. There will be spasms of reform and the rascals will be turned out for a term. Great will be the satisfaction among the people. At the very next election the rascals will be turned in again. The good citizens have been convinced that wily politicians, whose lives have been spent in playing the game of the ballot, have been squelched for all time. They would not cherish such a belief were the question one of competition in business.

Often the cry—always raised, at the outset, by the crooked politician, mind you—"Our city is being ruined by slander!" convinces the decent voter that it is time to let things political quiet down. In one notable instance a great city was torn to pieces, socially and politically, over the question whether or not it was proper to prosecute a bribe-giver. Many of the best men and women argued that an indicted steel railway magnate who sought to extend franchises by bribing officials, was forgivable if not justified. "Everybody did it before him," his excusers said. "He had to have the franchises to give us decent transportation. He couldn't get them without buying them. What could he do?" This code of ethics has so far obtained that reform was beaten in that city in the last election—as it was, alas! in many other cities of the Union.

"Not Five Cents to Make Five Millions"

May I tell you, briefly, a true story that is the reverse of the above? Not long ago, in a big city in the central zone of the United States, a valuable street railway franchise neared its expiration. The president of the railway knew that by spending $50,000 or less he could secure the extension of his franchise for a quarter of a century. He knew, too, that such extension would add millions to the value of the company's stocks. More than one of his directors couldn't understand why this president hesitated, and told him so.

"I am not hesitating," he informed them. "I wouldn't spend five cents in bribes to win five million dollars on stock values. I'll resign the presidency if you wish, but my family and myself own the majority of voting stock and you shall not elect a bribe-giver to succeed me."

The end is not yet in that street railway contest, but it is in sight and decency will win. If virtue keeps as stiff a neck as vice, in matters in which politics enter, virtue is sure to conquer at last. That is the hope we have for our future.

Cities Abroad

In England city government has settled into certain definite requisites that it has taken centuries to determine. The Englishman of affairs works for the love of it. There have been cases of graft in British cities, but discovery meant quick punishment and complete suppression. Your English mayor or alderman is proud of his position because of the opportunity given to improve his city. His own emoluments are too small to be considered. His rewards must be what many American officials would regard as the merest sentimentalities.

Germans make a close, exhaustive study of municipal government—as they do of most things affecting their Empire, and there are no notable scandals in the realm of the Kaiser. The official thief has a short shrift under Germanic systems and his rewards do not tempt him, as in this country, to brave imprisonment.

French cities have too many officials —French publicists deeply deplore t tendency of their countrymen to r gard public office, even if petty, as t highest good. None the less is it tr that French civic governments are f the most part clean and effectiv Gallic pride, local and national, h weight as a factor in keeping officia straight—Gallic shrewdness and thri are factors in repressing crime and securing economy in public expen ture.

What Are the Remedies?

What shall America do to remo this shameful condition of municip corruption and incompetence?

All thinking men of clean lives a patriotic aspirations agree that t people, by their votes, can solve t problem. It is good to know th despite retrograde instances, despi the triumph of bossism in many plac despite the discouragements of la November's elections, the trend is u ward. Graft is not as open, as o nivorous, as shameless as it was t years ago. There is honest a earnest inquiry into the best form city government. Galveston, D Moines, Tacoma, Colorado Springs a trying, or are about to try, gover ment by small commissions, which, fined in a general way, does away wi wards, places all powers in the han of a commission of from three to fi men, and uses the initiative, recall a referendum both for suggestion a restraint. As an evidence, howev of how difficult it is to rouse the vot the case of Tacoma comes in poi Out of a total voting population 17,000 only 4,500 took the trouble vote on the new charter.

Less prolix, less complex charte for our cities would, it is believ tend toward greater decency in g ernment; and all agree that grea simplicity in bookkeeping, followed wider publicity of financial repor would work for good.

Boston, one of the proudest American cities, has taken up t matter of general urban reform in highly intelligent and effective w To-day scores of Boston's best m chants, manufacturers, lawyers, ba ers, teachers and general business m are giving a very considerable port of their time to study of urban pr lems and to formulating reports betterment of conditions.

These men are sub-committees the great committee of the whole g erated in the Boston Chamber of Co merce. They do not seek to ant onize the officials—they do try a point out "the better way." It is a certified copy of decree of honorable dismissal from ranks, which was engraved upon to plates of bronze, one of which w placed in the proper depository such documents in Rome and the ot in Alexandria.

Two Aspects of God *

UST as a good earthly father may seem to you, according to your behavior, like the giver of your choicest gifts; or, on the other hand, like the stern dispenser of justice when you have disobeyed him; so our heavenly Father may appear to us in his different aspects.

It is a custom among us of this generation to dwell lightly upon the justice of our God. "He loves us," say our modern teachers. "Don't think of Him as chastising us."

Certain sects even go so far as to claim that God never punishes men. "He allows them to suffer," say these new interpreters of Scripture, "but God himself could not, in consonance with his character, ever cause a tear or a heartache."

Where do they get Scriptural warrant for such quibbling?

"What?" said Job. "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?"

We are all prone to sin. God, like a wise father, corrects us, and thus makes us humble and teachable. He gives and he takes away, and all for our good.

But it is one of the inexplicable features of his government that the wicked sometimes flourish like the green bay tree, while the righteous are visited with calamities.

Eliphaz the Temanite was not always sound in his reasoning. He voiced the shallow philosophy of his time in saying, "Who ever perished, being innocent?" For we know now that God does not complete his punishments in this world. His rain falleth equally upon the just and the unjust. But Eliphaz was right when he said, "Happy is the man whom God correcteth."

"What beautiful things there are in the Bible!" say some of Christ's followers. "Why should not men believe the pleasant and ignore the disagreeable things?"

"Hear the words of the risen Lord," says Joseph A. Richards. "O fools and slow of heart to believe ALL!

"Ought not Christ to have suffered? and must Jesus bear the cross alone and all the world go free?"

It is for us to feel the thornpricks, as well as to pluck the roses of his love.

One of the most convincing proofs of the existence of a divine Power in the universe is the reign of law. We know that all matter is governed by laws. What they are we learn but slowly. We break them oftener through ignorance than through intention; but, whatever our motive or lack of motive, the penalty for the broken law is never remitted; and as Drummond has so beautifully demonstrated, law reigns as inexorably in the moral and spiritual as in the physical. You are alone in your house. You step to the door on some errand. It blows together behind you and you are locked out. Great inconvenience may result—possibly suffering. "Evil is wrought by want of thought, as well as by want of heart."

When the Lord's hand is heavy upon us it behooves us to reflect well upon our ways. Our sorrow may be meant as a punishment.

Or it may be simply intended as a warning; or to sweeten and refine us; or to make us know more sympathy for others.

As in the olden story, "Uncle Tim" sang loudest when his "bad leg" pained him the hardest; so when we pass through the deep waters, let us praise our God most heartily.

He leadeth us. It is well, no matter where the path may lie.

The Overland for 1911

Licensed under Selden patent

Why the Overlands Must Be Right

The Overland this year offers 22 models—from 20 to 35 horsepower—from $775 to $1,675—meeting every idea on style or price or power.

The Overland has quickly become the most successful car ever created. Over 20,000 delighted owners are now telling others about these remarkable cars. And dealers have already paid deposits on more than 18,000 of the new-season models.

In the five Oveland factories, employing thousands of men, over $3,000,000 has been invested in the highest type of modern equipment.

All this prestige, this demand, this investment is at stake on producing cars which none can excel. Our dominant place would be forever lost if another car—at any price—ever gave better than Overland service.

They Must Be Right

Every material used in our chassis is the best that men know for the purpose. Every feature, regardless of cost, is made in accord with the best engineering practice.

In every car, the materials and parts are subjected to more than a thousand inspections—to more rigid inspection than any other maker employs.

Then every chassis, before the body is added, is given at least two severe road tests.

We take no chances on Overlands, for we have too much at stake. We permit no slighting, no skimping. Every part of every chassis is as good as it could be if we sold it at double our price.

The Cost Cut 28%

Overland prices are due to the use of modern automatic machinery—acres upon acres of it. Also to enormous production. Over $3,000,000 has to date been invested in the best of labor-saving equipment.

We have thus cut the cost of Overlands 28 per cent in the past two years—an average of $300 per car. At the same time we have secured such exactness as could never be secured in the old ways. And we have made every similar part interchangeable.

It is thus that we undersell every other maker who puts out a high grade car.

Fore Doors Included

We have employed on our 1911 models some of the ablest designers in the automobile line. The mechanism of the cars could not be further perfected, so their whole attention has been devoted to creating artistic designs. No car at any price has more style than the Overlands this year.

On several designs we offer the option of fore doors or open front—your choice at an equal price. For fore-door models are the coming vogue, and we have decided that Overland customers shall not be charged extra for them.

Our 1911 Prices

For $775 we are making a 20-horsepower car, easily capable of 45 miles an hour. The wheel base is 96 inches. Four cylinders, of course.

We are making a Torpedo Roadster—the latest type of a racy car—as low as $850.

The 25-horsepower Overlands, with 102-inch wheel bases, sell for $1,000—nine per cent less than last year. Touring car body, delivery body, roadtser or rumble seats.

The 30-horsepower Overlands, with 110-inch wheel bases, sell for $1,250. A wide choice of bodies, including a Torpedo Roadster, fore-door tonneaus and open front.

We are making a 4-passenger inside drive coupe—the ideal car for winter driving—for $1,250.

The 35-horsepower Overlands, with 118-inch wheel bases, sell for $1,600 and $1,675. All of these prices include magneto and full lamp equipment. Some have planetary transmissions, some sliding gear; some Remy magnetos, some Bosch. Our 22 models will meet any idea.

New Book of Designs

Please send us this coupon, or write us a postal, for our 1911 Book. It shows all the new designs and gives all specifications. It will enable you to compare Overlands, detail by detail, with any other car. With it we shall send you the address of the nearest of our 800 dealers where the new models are shown.

in reviewing this great publication, said in part:

"Ridpath's History of the World may be regarded as a complete library in itself. No other work of its kind has ever supplied a History so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men. We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent hand, guiding and developing all things. We cheerfully commend this most popular and complete of all world histories to our readers."

THE REASON for Dr. Ridpath's enviable position as an historian is his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt.

RIDPATH in your home means you need never spend a lonely evening. You can associate with the world's heroes; you can cross the Rubicon with Caesar, after which Rome was free no more. You can sit at the feet of Socrates, the loftiest genius of the ancient world. You can kneel at the shrine of Lincoln, "the greatest human of all time, the gentlest memory of our world." It is ennobling to commune with these children of destiny. To be associated with great men and events is to be great one's self, and you will add to your store of knowledge which is power, and to the richness of your life.

L. C., Bridgeport, Conn. When does the harvest moon come?

It is the full moon nearest the autumnal equinox, the moon being then least inclined to the horizon. It rises with slight retardation for a number of nights, giving a succession of moonlit evenings.

F. H., Marshall, Tex. 1. Will you please tell me something of "Mona Lisa," the wife of Gioconda, of Florence? Was she a good woman? 2. Is the author of Natural Law in the Spiritual World still living? Is he reckoned orthodox? 3. Who are the Roycrofters?

1. Mona Lisa was the wife of Zanobi del Gioconda, commonly called Mona (i. e., Madonna) Lisa or la Gioconda. She must have been a gentle woman, quiet, modest and unassuming, but with a playful humor that, we think, undoubtedly made her a very pleasant and agreeable woman to know. 2. Henry Drummond, who wrote the book in question, died in 1897. He was a man of high attainments and noble Christian ideals, although he differed from many of his orthodox contemporaries in certain matters. See his biography in any good encyclopedia. 3. A company of very skilled handicraftsmen with headquarters at East Aurora, N. Y.

C. A. B., Lancaster, Wash. 1. What is meant by "water," in John 3: 5? 2. What is meant by "tares," in Matt. 13: 27?

1. "Water" simply means the outward element used in the visible form of baptism. Of itself, it is unavailing for regeneration and salvation unless accompanied by or followed by the spiritual baptism of the Holy Spirit; hence the association in the text. 2. By "tares" is meant all evil or uncharitable thoughts, words, or deeds, which creep into men's lives, and which must be utterly destroyed before the ingathering of the wheat into the barn. In the previous parable, these are symbolized by the "thorns" which "grew up and choked" the good seed of the Word.

W. J. K., Halifax, N. S., and Miss M. E. F. B., Cambridge, Mass. Where can I find the poem from which the stanza was taken in the article "How to Watch," in your issue of January 26?

It is from a long poem called "He Will Come," and printed in the old volume, The Changed Cross and Other Poems, issued by A. D. F. Randolph, New York. There the verses are anonymous. They have sometimes been accredited to Edna Dean Proctor. The volume above is probably now out of print, but the poem may possibly be found in some of the modern collections.

L. F. T., Richmond, Va. Is it true that persons, in dying, are given visions of the other world, and are able in some cases to leave such a message to their friends?

Well-authenticated instances of such are on record; but it does not necessarily follow that all ante-mortem visions or messages are reliable. It is doubtless true, however, that as the aged Christian approaches the time of departure, the veil becomes more transparent and such a one has spiritual comforts and assurances which the world does not know.

H. S., Roca, Neb. How far had the builders of the Tower of Babel proceeded, and how high was the tower when God confounded their language?

There is no record to show to what height it had risen. Oriental explorers hold that it is probably identical with the great ruin discovered in Mesopotamia, and known to the Arabs as Birs Nimroud, which rises abruptly out of the plain to a height of 156 feet. There are other ruins, however, which investigators believe have fully as good a claim as this to be identified with Babel.

C. L. T., Cuthbert, Ga. I was much interested in the gold casket presented to Mr. Roosevelt at the Guildhall, London, you wrote about in issue of 22d of June, page 585. The cut is small, but I wish you would give a description and explain the emblems illustrated thereon. This will be interesting and instructive to a Bible class who are interested in the coat-of-arms of England and the seal of the United States and their Bible origin. (Ezek. 1: 10; Rev. 4: 7.)

Standing on the top of the casket presented to Colonel Roosevelt is the American eagle, supporting the American coat-of-arms against its breast; on one side is a seated figure of Britannia holding the Union Jack, on the other a figure typifying America holding the Stars and Stripes. On the sides are the coats-of-arms of the city of London. The one facing in the picture shows the cross of St. George and two banners of St. George, the old colors of England, and also of the American colonies during the seventeenth century. The American Society of Colonial Wars has this same flag for

"Mona Lisa" Offer Extended

A SPLENDID RECEPTION

IT may interest you to know that we have already sent thousands of copies of the famous picture "Mona Lisa" to our readers. This picture is becoming popular among our readers, which indicates that art at its best is always appreciated, especially by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. The vast number of letters we have received convinces us that it would not be fair to withdraw the "Mona Lisa" offer until each and every reader has been given an opportunity to obtain this superb reproduction of one of the world's greatest paintings.

Therefore, we have extended the offer for a few more weeks in order to give you a chance to obtain a copy of "Mona Lisa." Simply send us the full names and addresses of 25 men and women, no two in the same home, whom you think likely to be interested in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. To these names we will send copies of our Annual Holiday Catalogue, and endeavor to induce them to join our CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. Enclose ten cents to pay mailing expenses, and the picture will be sent promptly, uncreased and undamaged delivery guaranteed.

We believe every CHRISTIAN HERALD reader is interested in this Great Weekly for the American Home to the extent that he or she would like to see it enter many, many more homes. Think of the homes into which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD could bring hours of entertainment, and bring also a wider and broader knowledge of religious men and methods, as well as an abundance of good, wholesome, helpful, and instructive reading on matters of general interest and of timely importance. And after all it is the entertaining things—the good, warm-blooded, human stories of deep vital interest—that take hold of us and make us a nation of respected and law-abiding citizens. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is full of these things. It is doing a great work, but it wants to reach more people and it is asking you, gentle reader, to extend your helping hand in this glorious cause and ambition. Surely you know of 25 persons whose lives could be brightened by our helpful and inspirational Weekly. Send them along quickly!

Leonardo Da Vinci, the man who painted "Mona Lisa," was one of the greatest men that ever lived. He was the most accomplished painter of his generation and one of the most accomplished of the world; a distinguished sculptor, architect, and musician, and an incisive critic. His unpublished writings and the records of his inventions prove him to have anticipated at a hundred points the great masters of reasoned discovery in the ensuing age. "Mona Lisa" was the wife of a respectable Florentine merchant, and she was selected to pose for this painting because Leonardo seemed to have found in her a woman whose features possessed in a singular degree the intellectual charm in which he delighted, and in whose smile was realized that inward, haunting, mysterious expression which had always been his ideal.

He worked, it is said, at her portrait during some portion of four successive years, causing music to be played during the sittings, that the rapt expression might not fade from off her countenance. It remains, perhaps, the most striking example of his powers.

Our reproduction is a beautiful brown photogravure on de luxe stock that brings out much of the detail necessary to a finished picture. It is a superb painting, and we know you will never cease to treasure it. You can get it for almost nothing by simply sending 25 names and ten cents for mailing expenses.

Act now as this offer is soon to be withdrawn.

its standard with a gold crown in the centre. The lion is one of the supporters of the British coat-of-arms and is used as symbolic of Britain's warlike strength. The buffalo was used to balance it on the American side. Various views of old London are engraved on the sides of the casket.

Mrs. L. A. R., Derry, N. H. Does not Isa. 32: 1, 2, refer to Christ?

Properly understood, the verses from 1 to 8 are descriptive of the Millennium, in which sense verses 1 and 2 would clearly apply to the risen and exalted Jesus. Even the Jews accepted this prophecy as Messianic, and in no other way, nor to any other person, could it be applied.

J. W. C., Roseville, Ill. Did our first presidents make the same effort to control legislation that our presidents of late years have?

It has always been the custom for the president to recommend legislation where he thought it advisable, and to endeavor to see his ideas embodied in laws. If his policy was ignored he would consider his term as a failure. Presidents have always urged Congress and the people to support measures in which they were greatly interested.

J. L. H., Brunswick, O. 1. Can the names of the twelve stones, as said to be in the foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem, be given as we know them? 2. What is the meaning? A jeweler gave me a few names as emerald, signifying "happiness."

1. All these stones mentioned are well known at the present day, a very few having modern names. 2. The symbolism attached to these stones at the present day is purely fanciful and arbitrary. Under the Mosaic dispensation there was a rigid symbolism attached to the stones which formed the breastplate of the high priest, which cabalistic meaning and symbolism pertains also to these stones mentioned in the book of Revelation.

M. S., East McDonough, N. Y. Please explain Zech. 11: 16, 17. Who is meant by "the idol shepherd"?

The passage quoted is interpreted by some as meaning anti-Christ and by others as referring to all those pastors of whatever denomination who prove unfaithful to their spiritual duties and calling. The word "idol" used here, has been better translated "worthless" in the Revised Version.

H. D. J., Allenton, Mo. 1. What is the origin of the present remarkable "swing toward righteousness" in public life? 2. Why does not the sixth commandment read, "Thou shalt not murder"? Please explain the prohibition. 3. How may we realize in experience and work the Saviour's statement, "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do"? Are not purely spiritual works meant here?

1. The awakening of the public conscience and the efforts in the direction of national State and municipal reformation can have on one source—the secret and invisible working of the Spirit of God. 2. Merely a question of translation. The prohibition is plain, however worded. Jesus fully explained it in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5: 21, 22). 3. The required condition is expressed in the given quotation; and had Jesus intended the promise to apply only to spiritual works, he would have said so. As a historical fact, wonderful works of faith and miracles of healing were common in the Christian Church of the first two centuries. Early records of these are to be found in the Epistles.

Reader, Larned, Kan. Where does it read in the Bible, "Before the end of time you will not know the winter from the summer only by the green leaves of the trees?"

No such passage in the Bible. The only passages from which such an inference could be drawn (and that by a strained conclusion) are the eighteenth chapter of Isaiah and last chapter of Zechariah.

Miscellaneous

F. A. Bristow, Urbanna, Va., wishes to have the address of his brother Charles E., who has been missing for several years.

A. J. W., Neillsville, Wis. 1. The sermon follows the chronology of the Septuagint, while our correspondent adheres to the chronology of the present Hebrew version. The respective authorities are Hales in the former case, Usher in the latter. The evangelist is not known personally to us.

Reader, Pittsburg, Kan. Your experience is not an unusual one. Nothing is to be gained, however, by declining to join the church. On the contrary, we believe that one good, earnest Christian, with zeal tempered by prudence and judgment and the skill to avoid quarrels, can leaven a whole congregation and by his Christ-like example revive its spiritual life and activity. Don't criticize harshly, be kind and generous in your judgments, and remember you will accomplish nothing unless you set about with a heart overflowing with love for others.

Viscount Terauchi, Governor of Korea

The Great "Gate of Honor" in Seoul

The Ex-Emperor of Korea

WHAT WILL JAPAN DO IN KOREA?

Two Experienced Missionaries Present Opposing Views on the Subject

Prince Kon
Heir to the Throne of Korea

ONE of the providential things in the propagation of the Gospel in Korea has been the friendly attitude on the part of the Japanese Prime Minister and Prince Ito. To the latter the missionaries have been especially indebted for sympathy and cordial support; and this has meant more than it is possible to realize, because in a country where the government is absolute, the friendly attitude of the officials is essential to any successful religious propaganda. Even indifference would have made the work of the missionaries much less popular and successful. As the successor of Prince Ito was a military man, and supposed to be of a more stern disposition, as well as accustomed to deal with questions from a different standpoint, it was generally feared that a different atmosphere would prevail among those in official circles and that the work of the missionaries in Korea would suffer.

But to the credit of the rulers in Japan and the relief of many anxious minds, the policy that has been proclaimed is one that gives entire relief, and is certainly creditable to the wise and liberal statesmanship of the men who have had the direction of affairs. In the treatment of a subject nation and consideration of the interests of the missionary body working in Korea, no more generous terms or attitude could be asked for or expected. It is also in strange contrast with the conduct of France in Madagascar, or the East India Company in India in the beginning of mission work there.

In a proclamation by the Governor-General of Korea, Viscount Terauchi, he speaks as follows:

"There is no doubt that a good religion, be it either Buddhism, or Confucianism, or Christianity, has as its aim the improvement, spiritual as well as material, of mankind at large, and in this not only does it not conflict with administration, but really helps it in attaining the purpose it has in view. Consequently, all religions shall be treated equally; and further, due protection and facilities shall be accorded to their legitimate propagation."

In an interview which was granted by General Terauchi, the Resident-General, he was asked, "What will be your Excellency's future policy?" His reply was:

"I can only assure you at present that my policy is to consolidate the bonds between the two peoples. We don't regard the new territory as a dependency, but as an integral part of the Empire of Japan, and its people as subjects of his Majesty the Emperor of Japan. I have enjoined Japanese people not to assume a haughty attitude, but to treat the Koreans with sympathy and good will."

When asked, "What impressions have you concerning foreign missionaries?" he replied: "Freedom of religion will always be respected, and I am ready to extend due protection and facilities to the propagation of all religious doctrines, provided they do not interfere with politics. I am one of those who fully appreciate the good work of foreign missionaries, and as we have the same object in view as they—the improving of the general conditions of the people—their work will by no means be subject to any inconvenience. I need scarcely say that all the vested rights of foreign residents will be fully respected."

The retention of the eminent Christian, Judge Watanabe, at the head of the Judicial Department, is an indication and assurance that Christian men and Christian principles are not to be discriminated against, but on the contrary, given the recognition to which they are entitled.

A Situation Full of Danger, Yet Not Without Hope

EVERYWHERE in America we hear men say "It was inevitable." It certainly was anticipated, but to say that it was inevitable is going too far. However, that thing has been accomplished and what we want to know is this: What effect will Japanese control of Korea have upon the progress of Christian civilization in the Far East?

Japan has made wonderful strides in the field of industry and science. She is possessed of boundless energy and of great ability. She has won her place in the line of progressive Powers and has demonstrated beyond dispute her physical prowess. It is her avowed purpose to become the leader of progress throughout the Far East. But at this point we might draw a comparison between her and the nation that she has subjugated. Christianity has been making far greater progress in Korea than in Japan during the past ten years. There is something in the Korean temperament, a certain balance between reason and emotion, between idealism and materialism, that makes them far more open to the

THE SOUL RESTORED

TEXT—Ps. 23:2, 3

IN the text as I have announced it, two statements, separated by the structure of the verses and by our English punctuation, are united. Whether the division and the punctuation be right or wrong, it is very certain that the two processes are indissoluble in human experience. The first step toward the restoration of the soul is to lead us beside still waters—in the margin, the "waters of rest." Those waters of rest may flow for us in a desert place where no stream is, or through the crowded city where yet a place of privacy and a time to think may be found, down the snow-swept mountain heights or by the sick-bed of a hospital ward. The essential thing is that there should be a withdrawal, whether compulsory or voluntary, from the rush of life; from its multifarious engagements, rivalries, combats, defeats, triumphs; from the fever we call living; and that the soul should be at home with itself, free to wander through space, to muse, to dream, as irresponsible as the viewless wind, not consciously seeking anything, not even God, but ready to be seized and held by the ever-brooding Spirit of the Most High, of whom we rapturously sing: "He leadeth me beside the waters of rest: he restoreth my soul." It is of the goodness of God that, like the prophet Ezekiel, we are sometimes permitted to hear his word: "Arise! Leave the busy city; seek the silent, introspective plain, and I will talk with thee there."

Temporarily "Laid Aside"

This goodness is not less good because it comes to us in what seems to be at the time the crowning calamity of our lives. It comes in a blow which shatters all our hopes, our projects, our ambitions; which flings down the edifice of our cherished dreams as the sweep of a rough hand flings down the house of cards which a child has built, while we stand terrified, horror-stricken, amid the ruins. It comes in a long illness which turns the mind in upon itself and frees the soul to commune with God. But the interrupted career, the thwarted purpose, the cramped and limited life, may be our Father's way of leading the child of his love beside the waters of rest, the first step in his beautiful saving work—the work of restoring our soul.

At the beginning of what was to prove a long and serious illness I rebelled with all the stubborn strength of spirit which bodily weakness had left me against the frightful waste of time involved. I thought of all the claims of human life upon us in this day, when home, and church, and city call us; when by every plea of pity and by every claim of right we are urged—alike the weakest and the strongest of us—to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, and for the spirituality of Christ's cause and kingdom. I thought of all the thousand-fold activities which make life so well worth living in our time, and of the shortness of the longest life which finds so much to do for man and God. And a physician whom I met in Europe tried to console me, telling me that experience had taught him that such periods of enforced idleness were not all lost. He said that the mind was recuperating its forces, accumulating material, and garnering wisdom, for its return to the world of work. But still I murmured and pitied myself, arguing that if I had mental energy to apply myself to a science, to learn a language, to master a wealth of good books, or even to write poor ones, the time might not be lost. But that it could be a good thing for any mind to be driven into helpless inactivity for so long, that the mind could learn by not learning, accumulate by not gathering, and store up wealth without once receiving it, seemed to me a palpable absurdity.

God Working in Our Lives

But I know now that it is altogether a mistake to suppose that conscious seeking is the only path to God and conscious thinking the only medium of revelation. I know now that there is some reality behind the curious fact which musicians have related, that with the true artist there comes a time when pleasure in the successful handling of the instrument disappears, when the player himself becomes the instrument, the glorious medium through which music flows. I understand what many swimmers and some speakers have told me—for swimming and oratory are much alike!—that after dozens, scores, of bungling, unsuccessful attempts to swim or speak, and after floundering beyond their depth and choking with salt-water or with spluttering syllables, one day they have found themselves floating gracefully along upon the bosom of the waves or upon a stream of gentle, rhythmic speech, and have not even stopped to feel surprised that they were getting along so well. I understand the teacher, quoted by the great psychologist of our day whose untimely end Harvard and the world mourn, who, when the pupils had tried and tried again to do something they could not do, used to tell them, "Stop trying and it will do itself!" We used to try to explain these things to ourselves by talking about "unconscious cerebration"—thinking when we did not know we were thinking. For many years the psychologists have been investigating these singular, less understood processes of the human mind. They now assure us that "unconscious" is not the right word to use. The process, they say, is not entirely unconscious. And they ask us to use a yet vaguer term, "subconscious," or even one still mistier, "subliminal," and they are teaching us to recognize this unmapped region of ourselves where things get themselves done almost without our knowing it till we wake up to find that they are done, as our "subliminal consciousness," or our "subconscious self."

Strength Through Weakness

Well, this subconscious self is a world in which God works. An English poet once pointed out an amiable absurdity of which his friends were sometimes guilty. In some fair scene, when the earth smiled in the light of God's countenance, his friends would ask him, "Could you not sit and write a sonnet here? Does not this inspire your loveliest thoughts?" And he tried to explain that poetry was not turned out in any such fashion. The fair scene made its impression, became part of himself. The poem came afterwards, in quiet among his books. And he went so far as to formulate his theory about it. "Poetry," he said, "is remembered emotion." Indisputably, Wordsworth was on his side. His joy was deep and real as he watched his daffodils tossing their golden heads beside the dancing waves of Ullswater. But deeper, realer joy came afterwards. Long as he gazed he did not realize all the happiness they had brought him.

> For oft, when on my couch I lie
> In vacant or in pensive mood,
> They flash upon that inward eye
> Which is the bliss of solitude;
> And then my heart with pleasure fills,
> And dances with the daffodils.

And it has been so with us, though we have not known it. The time of our weakness, our pain, our loss, the hours when we were forced to lay down the responsibilities of life because the weight of the grasshopper was a burden too heavy to be borne, were times of revelation, of growth, of the accumulation of moral courage, to serve us in the good glad days which were to come. My brother, my sister, you have known such times as these. Life then was not worth living. The heart was sick, and all the wheels of being slow. You had little hope and no faith, and neither the strength nor the desire to pray for God's Spirit. Yet God be praised, he did not take his holy Spirit from you! Visions were granted to you though you saw them not. Thoughts came to you and you could not think them. Facts were multiplied but you could not catalogue them. Deductions appeared but you could neither relate them to your general conceptions of life nor register them in their proper place. Yet in the great light which shone round about you those visions were photographed upon your subliminal consciousness. All the time your subconscious self was sifting the deductions, appropriating the essential lesson of the facts, working all up into the larger, more spiritual power with which you were to face the world again after God had led you by the waters of rest: when God had restored your soul.

I speak to you who have known times of weary waiting, the long agony of hope deferred, and the unspeakable pang of loss. Do I not know your pain? Oh, I share it with you. But I bid you believe in God. Believe in the Father-God. Believe in his love. Believe that your loss is not all loss; nay, that your loss may be immortal gain! If the poets learn in suffering what they teach in song how much more shall you, who have suffered and yearned and aspired, and grown wiser and purer through all, learn to assert the everlasting reality of God's providence and his unfailing love! And when you speak with that dogmatism for which the broadest theology must make room, the unassailable dogmatism of a spiritual experience, and when men demand of you how these things can be and where you learned them, you shall answer:

> I knew not then the gauge of time,
> Nor wore the manacles of space;
> I felt it in some other clime,
> I saw it in some other place.
> 'Twas when the heavenly house I trod,
> And lay upon the breast of God.

The Comfort of His Promise

Other considerations surge up before our view from the shoreless seas of memory as we repeat these words to ourselves: "He restoreth my soul." And as I linger near them, and look upon them with sympathetic gaze, it seems to me that this promise enshrines the very richest of all God's mercies. It seems to me that almighty power and everlasting love have no greater gift than this: "He restoreth my soul."

I see the man or woman whom the world has hardened. We cannot withdraw from the world's work. We would not if we could; we could not if we would. The command, "Come ye out from among them and be ye separate," is not for us. Judaism was separation. Christianity is permeation. Work woos us. The combat calls. Daily strife is our meat and drink. Even that which looks like base avarice is not always so. Sometimes it is the habit and the passion of work. The faults of aggrandisement may be the healthy instincts of work perverted. While we live, our place is in the world of struggle. But there all of us grow hard and some of us grow bitter. We lose faith, hope, chivalry. Our pride sustains us, and we tell ourselves that we have "outgrown" the callow ignorance of days when we were deceived a thousand times because we believed everything and trusted everybody. So we boast. But in our hearts is the knowledge, if we would only look for it there, that we are not better men and women for this precious "growth" of ours but worse; we are harder and coarser of grain, and we would give all this worldly wisdom in exchange for that generous capacity of soul which had it in it to be deceived. The world would make cynics of us, and Christ would have us enter into his kingdom as men and women of the childlike heart. For us the promise stands: "He restoreth my soul." Oh, the unspeakable riches of the mercy which brings back to us faith in men and women, faith in fallen men and women, faith in the possibilities of our manhood and womanhood, faith that the God in ourselves is mighty to save! The gates of lost Eden are open again.

Spiritual Degeneracy and Its Cure

I see the dispirited laborer in Christ's vineyard. Oh, but we grow weary in well-doing! We are tired of the slow progress of our cause. Fevered dreams, futile plans, fruitless strife—it is the same dull, painful round of hope and disillusion, of faith and the bafflement of great endeavor. And there is worse than this; for this is external, temporary, accidental. The terrible fact is that the years bring to us a moral obtuseness. The wings of prayer no longer bear us upward. Aspirations toward God are blunted. Spiritual sensibility is encrusted over. There are certain recognized, uniform stages in this deterioration. First we begin to question the supreme necessity of effort. We doubt whether the wrongs to be remedied are so colossal. We are not so sure about the call to us to set the wrong thing right. There was a time when our blood boiled at the sight of triumphant wrong. There was a time when it chilled in our veins before the pathos of human suffering. But now we can say quite calmly that "it is all very sad," and pass by with an unruffled pulse.

Examine your hearts. Is not this true to the letter? Measure your present against your past by the test of your relation to some moral cause, the Temperance Movement, the Peace Movement, the general work of social reconstruction, the cause of human redemption for which your Saviour died. If you can say that for you the years have only brought a growing sensibility and a deepening consecration, God be praised! This sermon is not preached to you. And I am not the man to preach it. You are a better man than I am. You have walked with God and his angels. But it is not so with all of us. Our passion cools. The sunshine blackens. We lost the glory of the day. And the one redeeming, hopeful element in the dire confession is that we are continually saying:

Where is the blessedness I knew
When first I saw the Lord?
Where is the soul-refreshing view
Of Jesus and His word?

and that we are ready to go down on our knees and pray: Lord, restore my soul. I beseech you, pray that prayer. I have watched the progress of physical disease. I have looked into the eyes of death. And I tell you that just as physical pain endured to agony is less of an evil than the soul corrupted and rotted by sin, so the atrophy of every limb and of every member of the body is less to be feared than the paralysis of faith and hope and love when the soul no longer leaps up at the pleading of God. But —he restoreth my soul! He brings us faith again, faith in ideals, in principles, in spiritual forces, in moral causes, in the tendencies which make for righteousness. He gives us power once more to despise prudence and convention, to do the right in sovereign scorn of consequence, to inscribe upon our banner: All for Christ, and the world well lost!

This is the blessing for the man or woman whom the world has hardened, for the dispirited toiler, for the prodigal child who is far from his Father's home: "He restoreth my soul!" How shall we find the blessing?

But if this question be asked in realizing earnestness there is no need to answer it. To ask it is almost all. It is at least enough. Do you ask it from the heart? Would you have the soul restored as God's good gift? We shall not need to seek the blessing; God is seeking us. But we shall place ourselves within the conditions which in other days have favored the communion of man with God. We shall turn to the associations of prayer and praise and godly fellowship. Soon our hearts will cry, "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go unto the house of the Lord." We shall crowd to the ministry of God's word, and join our prayers with those of the men and women who love the preacher for his deeper insight into human need and his re-vitalized passion of social righteousness. We shall draw near to men and women of the Spirit, people of enthusiasm and moral fervor, who keep the sacred fire burning in their God-filled souls. We shall open once more an old, old Book, and read there the old, old story of Christ's Cross and Passion, of the seeking, saving love of God incarnate in Jesus Christ his Son. We shall cry aloud to this Jesus of Nazareth who passes by, "Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us"; and we shall hear his word, louder than all voices of the street, "If ye have seen me, ye have seen the Father."

And so the shadows fall apart,
And so the west winds play,
And all the windows of my heart
I open to the day!

ALL SAINTS' DAY

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

ONE tick, and a moment dies. Sixty ticks, and a minute dies. Sixty minutes, and an hour dies. Twenty-four hours, and a day dies. Three hundred and sixty-five days, and a year dies. The short life and flight and death of time! You begin to tell something, and time dies before you can finish. It was the death of time that troubled the man who wrote the eleventh chapter of Hebrews. He was writing about the good people who had by faith done wonderful things. After writing thirty-one verses he had to stop. "Time failed me to tell."

Pope Boniface IV. had the same trouble. There were a number of saints and each one deserved to have a day named in his memory. But he had but three hundred and sixty-five days and on his list were more than three hundred and sixty-five saints. What was he to do? He selected one day and called it "All Saints' Day." This is the day we celebrate on November 1.

ISN'T it splendid to know that there are not enough days, not enough time, to tell about all the good people in this world? There would be plenty of time to tell about all the bad people. Probably you have heard mamma say: "The daily paper tells too much about evil people and about the bad things they do." Tell mamma that we do not have a paper big enough to tell about all the good things that are done. If all the good deeds of all the good people in all of our country were printed on any one day in any one of our daily papers, what would happen? It would require a two-horse wagon or an automobile truck to bring that paper to your house. The paper would be too big to get it in through your door. You would have to spread it out on the street in order to read it. Then there would not be room for people to walk along the street while you were reading your paper. But we can put all the wicked things that are done in one day in one paper that is small enough to fold up and put in one of papa's pockets.

A CROWD watches a house on fire. But just think of that crowd looking at every house that is not on fire. You will stop and look at a man who is staggering along the street, but you could not possibly get time to stop and look at every man who does not stagger.

There are more saints than sinners. I hear you ask, "Who are saints?" By saints the Bible means any one who loves God and his fellow-man. You thought the saints were all dead? You can be a saint without dying or even being sick. A saint is an every-day good person. Don't be afraid of the ring of light that hangs over the heads of picture saints. There is no such ring or halo. If there were it would come to the one whose head it would fit like his hat.

HOW would this plan suit you for the evening before All Saints' Day, called All Hallow's Eve? Make a list of the good people you know and love and write to them and say that to-morrow, All Saints' Day, you are going to put their names in your Saints' Gallery. Could not do it? Why? "Time would fail me to tell." Then try another plan. Make a list of those who are not saints, those whose gates you thought of taking off, those on whom you thought of playing some trick on Hallowe'en. "Good! Good!" you say. "We can do that, as there are only two or three in our neighborhood."

How can you know a real saint? You will find that he loves children and would be willing to die for them. I wonder if this is not why "All Saints' Day" is the Children's Day? A story? All right, take this one by Mr. Dayton. He tells of some of those "close calls" which every engineer must reckon on as part of the day's work.

A MOST remarkable instance of this sort happened many years ago on a railway in eastern Missouri and was told in a railway paper. One summer morning a twelve-car train containing the members of a Sunday School was bound for a picnic at a point about fifty miles distant. Although the sky was cloudless when the excursion started, the train had not proceeded more than half way when a thunder-storm broke. The rain fell in torrents. The engineer was worried for fear the terrific downpour might cause a washout or spreading of the rails, and he slowed down to about thirty-five miles an hour. As the train swung around a curve and approached a small station which it was to pass without stopping, the engineer, peering through the broken curtain of rain, saw that the switch just ahead was open. It meant a terrible disaster. He closed the throttle and put on the brakes in an instant.

"Better stick to it," he shouted to his fireman, "hundreds of children on board."

"I mean to," was the answer. "God help us all!"

HIS last words were drowned by a terrific crash of thunder which came with a flash of lightning that seemed to strike the ground just ahead of the engine. The next thing they knew they were past the station, still riding safely on the main-line rails.

The train came to a stop and the engineer and conductor hurried back to discover what had happened and how the train had passed the open switch. They found that the lightning had struck squarely between the switch and the rail and had closed the switch. "It was the act of God," said the engineer.

A saint is one who does his best and trusts God to do the rest. I have a long list of every-day saints, but "time would fail me to tell."

Jesus and the Hermit

A Parable, by Marion Mills Miller

AS Jesus descended from his meditations in the mountain to preach again to the multitude, forth from a cave a hermit came to meet him. White of beard he was, yet his body, girt only in a loin-cloth, was still lithe and sinewy, and his piercing eye indicated unusual vigor of intellect.

"Rabbi," he said, "pray enter my humble home, for I would learn of thy wisdom."

Jesus entered the grotto and found it indeed an humble habitation. It was bare of even a chair, and a heap of rushes, covered with the hermit's mantle, served for a couch. But there were in every corner and cranny of the cave parchments and papyri. On a block of stone beside the pallet one book lay unrolled. It was illumined by an earthen lamp, and Jesus recognized it as a work of divine philosophy, such as he himself had learned under Hillel. The anchorite invited Jesus to sit upon the bed, and he himself crouched upon the rocky floor, looking up into the face of the Master with hungry eyes.

"Rabbi," he said, "what good thought hast thou for me, that I may attain eternal life?"

Jesus answered, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments."

The hermit's gaze was clouded with disappointment in Jesus as he answered, "Put me not off, Master, with idle words. Thou knowest that such as I steal not nor covet nor commit adultery; I kill not even for food; and I have no neighbor against whom I can bear witness either false or true; my mind is fixed wholly upon God. What lack I yet?"

Jesus said unto him, "If thou wilt be perfect, think also on thy neighbor."

The hermit answered, "I understand thy rebuke, but merit it not. I was rich in my youth, but, going to Alexandria to the schools, I became a disciple of Philo, and was inspired by him to give all my goods to the poor, save only my books, and to devote my life to spiritual things. And oh, how richly I have been blessed! What a store I have of precious thought of God!"

Jesus yet replied, "Think of thy neighbor; go forth among the people and again give them of thy riches."

In dismay the hermit cried, "But this wealth is too rare and precious for the common folk! Oh, the unspeakable beauty of Plato's Idea! The ineffable grandeur of Philo's Logos, the Person of the Wisdom of God! Hast thou not a thought to give me transcending even these, sweet Master!" And he hung with eager eyes upon Jesus.

Our Lord answered, "I go to feed my sheep. Follow thou me." And he went forth from the cave and began to descend the mountain side.

The hermit followed him to the door of the cave; there he paused and cast a loving look behind him at the sweet simplicity and calm life and dear self-communion of soul which he was leaving for a career of strenuous labor and stern self-sacrifice. The illumined page of the book held his eye.

"Follow me!" repeated the Master.

"No; I cannot leave my precious thoughts. They are my life and my soul!" and he rushed back within the cave, and resumed his study of the Logos, the mystic Word of God.

Jesus returned to his disciples and said unto them, "Verily I say unto you, that a spiritual miser shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven."

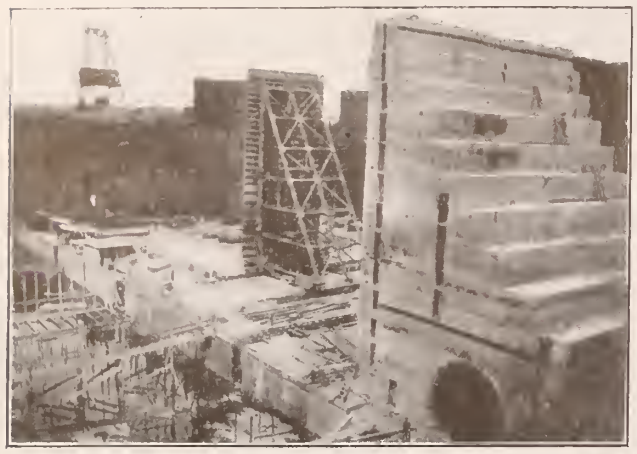
PROTECTING THE PANAMA CANAL



The Ponderous Concrete Walls at Gatun

Colonel Goethals Giving Instructions

The Sluiceway of the Great Dam at Gatun

JUST the other day J. Warren Kiefer, American representative at the Brussels Interparliamentary Congress, raised a storm of protest from all over the country when he declared that the United States cannot fortify the Panama Canal. The American delegate's statement showed that he had not made himself acquainted with the facts of the case. He was evidently under the impression that the first treaty with Great Britain—the "Bulwer-Clayton"—was ratified. Instead, for the very reason that it would not allow us to fortify the canal, it was dropped, and a new one substituted in its place—the "Hay-Pauncefote" treaty—under the terms of which the Canal can be properly protected.

"Once the people of the United States," says a prominent New York paper, "found the real meaning of the treaty, the State Department and the Senate were so overwhelmed with protests that, in the words of its prime opponent, 'this objectionable treaty was abandoned and the real Hay-Pauncefote one substituted.' That treaty permits the fortification of the Panama Canal.

"Since then the acquisition by this country of the territory on which the Canal is built dispels all question as to the right of the United States to fortify, and of the declared intention of the people of the United States to fortify their Canal, and to insure its use at all times—during peace or war—to the fleets and navies of the United States."

Only recently, down at Panama, we raised this question with Colonel Goethals himself and his reply was that "the President has said we have a right to fortify the Canal," and there he seemed inclined to let the matter drop. Asked, however, how he would do the work, he answered: "There's been a Board on Fortifications appointed, and this is for them to say." Touring the great Canal with Colonel Goethals, however, one got interesting sidelights on this matter of defenses. "The Canal," he holds, "is a question of military defense to the United States!" And, in that connection, note that it will put a limit to the maximum size of warships. While the present Canal will be amply large to pass the largest ship now in existence, no nation hereafter would be so foolish as to build a ship too large to pass through the Canal.

A number of the canal-builders seem to feel that if England has a war and is cut off from the East—where Japan is her great ally—she is coming through, treaty or no treaty, unless prevented. As things stand, we give equal rights to all warring nations, and as a consequence a number of the Congressmen have been opposed to defending the Canal—as long as nations observe this.

The power to regulate the use of the Canal, history plainly teaches us, can only be maintained by having guns to enforce it, with batteries and forts at either entrance.

Military authorities regard the waterway as a means of bringing warships rapidly from one coast to the other, and thus fewer warships will be needed to protect our shores from invasion. It will be interesting to see, as the years go on, how many such warships, at ten million dollars each, it will save. The cost of forty such will nearly equal the cost of the Canal. And then, when one recalls the trip of the Oregon he can readily see how it will increase the value of each ship, as well as aid in maintaining the Monroe Doctrine.

It becomes, therefore, an obvious fact that the Canal must be defended. In fact, Uncle Sam has been going ahead with his plans for such defenses for some time, critics thereof to the contrary notwithstanding.

English papers now admit that they criticised a first without a full knowledge of the facts and adm that, according to the Pauncefote agreement, w will be able to control our own Canal. Papers o the continent of Europe are also discussing th control of the Canal and admit that we have th chief interest in it, and that we have the right t arrange for its protection, so that it will not b wrecked by the first gunboat a warring power migh send in to blow up its locks. French papers hav nearly all been friendly in tone. German pape have evidently not taken so kindly to the idea, bu they seem to realize that to make any active opp sition to American plans would severely strain th pleasant relations now existing between the tw countries. The comments of American papers, fo a few days after the delegate's speech, showed ho deeply the whole country had been stirred. Nortl East, South and West called with one voice fo adequate defenses and any Congressman who at th late day tries to play into the hands of Europe wi find great difficulty in explaining his position to th voters.

WE cannot all be preachers and sway with voice and pen,
As strong winds sway the forest, the minds and hearts of men;
But we can be evangels to souls within our reach;
There's always love's own Gospel for loving hearts to preach.

—MOUNT BROOK, Fla., is experiencing a revival. Rev. W. E. Murphy, of Taft, is conducting the services. Thus far sixty-three have been baptized.

—CHAPLAIN J. C. TETER writes from Minneola, Fla., telling of prayer meetings and conversions among the life prisoners at Lake Kerr. Ten men have already taken a stand for Christ.

—MISSIONARY T. S. DONOHUGH, M. E. Mission, Meerut, India, writes: "We have now 25,000 Christians to look after and many thousands are waiting for baptism." A training school is greatly needed at the Meerut Mission.

—"I WRITE all over my Bible," says Dr. Wilfred Grenfell. "It makes us feel more like old friends. When one gets illegible I invest in another. It is a great help to me to look back and see how my own faith has grown since last I annotated the same passage."

—MRS. J. E. HOWARD, DeQuincy, La., writes: "In 1907 there were four saloons in DeQuincy and not one church building. Good people went to work and got the saloons out and we have built two churches. We are trying to clear them of debt by holding a quilt contest. Some of your readers may wish to help us."

—THE NINTH season of non-sectarian summer services at Lemon Hill Park, Philadelphia, just ended, was a great success. These services have been under the direction of Rev. Dr. James B. Ely from the beginning. The audiences average upwards of 2,500 persons.

—LANCASTER, Mo., has just witnessed a notable religious awakening. A union campaign was conducted by Evangelist C. E. Hillis. The workers had a tent that seated about 1,000, but crowds of 1,200 to 1,600 persons were in attendance. The chorus consisted of 150 singers. The campaign lasted four weeks. The last night of the meetings twenty-two came forward and accepted Christ as Saviour.

—BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BUTTS, one of the best known leaders of evangelistic singing, is now in Chicago assisting in the Chapman-Alexander campaign. After six weeks in that city, he will be associated with the Rev. William B. Holmes, D.D., of Lebanon, Tenn., in an extended evangelistic tour. Professor Butts is well known here through his connection for the past five years with the Evangelistic Committee of New York City.

—BISHOP J. E. HARTZELL (M. E. Church) writes from Old Umtali, Rhodesia, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "Rev. Shirley D. Coffin has been regularly appointed in charge of the work at Old Umtali. He is one of the most trusted and successful missionaries we have. I am making visits to the chief centres of our work. The Word of God is extending among these multitudes of native Africans and is becoming stronger every day among the European white settlers, who are developing a great British colony."

—MISSIONARY J. C. LAWSON of the India Industrial Mission, Pilibhit, United Provinces, has made an appeal to the readers of this journal for the support of four native preachers at $60 each, two Bible women at $40 each and a number of student preachers at $40 each. The rapidly growing spiritual work of the Mission calls for a substantial enlargement of the working force. It is an independent Mission. Here is an excellent opportunity for those who wish to have personal "missionary substitutes" at the front, who will keep them informed as to the progress of India's evangelization.

—MISSIONARY WM. H. HANNUM, of Vengurle, India, writes: "A statistical report of the Presbyterian Church in India for 1909 illustrates the progress of the various Christian bodies. This church was formed in 1904 by the organic union of seven denominations of the Presbyterian order. There is now a general assembly, comprising under it five synods, 14 presbyteries and 178 churches, 112 of the churches being fully organized. Baptisms of the year 4,743, those of adults being 2,410. Contributions, 45,000 rupees (over $15,000), a average of over one dollar apiece. The comm nicants now number 14,423, baptized perso 47,846, total persons enrolled 52,493, Sund Schools 648, Sunday School teachers 1,281, mi isters 230."

A Poetical Tribute

A READER of this journal, M Cyrus N. Robinson of Baltimor sends us a glowing poetical tribu from which we give these verses, r gretting that we cannot give the who poem:

I've been taking THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
For twenty and five years and o'er,
Till it seems like a part of my household,
Which I treasure each year more and mo

I pray that the light of THE HERALD
May constantly spread and expand;
Till its bright, shining rays shall illumine
The millions of homes in our land.

Sail on, proudly on, CHRISTIAN HERALD,
With the sweet Gospel banner unfurled;
Till all men shall hear the glad story
Of Jesus, the Light of the World!

FARM COLLEGES ON WHEELS

The Poultry Car of the "Farm Special"

The Dairy Car

A Practical Lecture in the Grass Car

EVER since the star of empire shone upon the bands of steel that crept across the continent from ocean to ocean, American railway men have been trying various means of attracting settlers to new lands which their enterprise has made accessible. Lately a new method of stimulating railroad traffic has been adopted—that of teaching the farmer to increase his crops. This is done by sending out agricultural colleges on wheels. In other words, not content with opening up new settlements, the railroads are increasing their freight tonnage by educating the farmers in the "older" parts of the country to get more results from their husbandry. These colleges on wheels are trains comprising well-equipped agricultural exhibits in charge of competent educators, on which the farmers are given free instructions in the science of dairying, agriculture and even forestry. In fact, every subject relating to the fostering and garnering of nature's rich bounties.

Last summer, no less than twenty of these instruction trains were sent out by the various railroads; but they were not all alike, nor was the same kind of instruction given in every case. In certain sections adjacent to the large cities, one railroad—the Erie—sent out "milk specials" in which dairying and cattle breeding were taught exclusively. This was done for the reason that these sections were especially adapted for dairying, because of the valuable pasture lands in close proximity to the great city markets.

In other sections, market gardening was exclusively taught, and in parts of the South, particular attention was devoted to rotating crops to enrich worn-out soil, while other trains were sent out equipped for teaching horticulture in all its branches in places where that form of husbandry would prove profitable. In the West, grain specials were sent out manned by grain experts, and on these nothing but grain lore was taught.

Some of "Uncle John's" Young Farm and Garden Students

It has remained for the New York Central lines, however, to go even beyond the efforts of most railroads in this direction by educating the new generation. Its agricultural train, like other trains of the kind, is in charge of prominent educators on agricultural topics; but in addition there is a special car for boys and girls. This car is in charge of John W. Spencer, an agricultural instructor recently retired from Cornell University under the age limit system. For many years, the State Agricultural College of Cornell University has made a practice of answering letters from school children, bearing inquiries on subjects relating to horticulture and natural history. These letters average thirty thousand a year and they come largely from youngsters of upper New York State. Most of the communications were until recently answered by Mr. Spencer, who signed his replies "Uncle John." Consequently "Uncle John's" name is a household word in the rural parts of New York.

President W. C. Brown of the New York Central Railroad knew this and it was his idea to attach to the agricultural special sent out by his company a car equipped for the children's own in charge of "Uncle John." So, while the older folks crowd into the dairy car, the poultry car and the farm garden car, wherever the train stops, the children pile into the forward car of the train labeled "Uncle John's Boys and Girls." There they are greeted by a gray-haired man of the comfortable rotundity ascribed to St. Nicholas himself, and it is safe to assert that that particular car holds more nature enthusiasts than any other coach on the train.

"Catch 'em young. Get them enthusiastic on farming topics while their minds are growing, and the next generation of railroad men won't have to bother about teaching agriculture." That is the way President Brown explained his reasons for providing instruction for the children.

To say that "Uncle John" carries out this theory to the letter is putting it mildly, as the majority of his auditors want to start a farm immediately on leaving the train. The lecturer talks to the boys and girls about insect life, the care of gardens, how to grow flowers and of the purity of nature's colors. He tells them of the living soil given to man to silently do his bidding. He explains that no man was intended to be born a servant—that the only servant God gave man other than animals, was the earth itself. He explains that every human being who knows how to till the soil and obtain from it the richness which the Creator put there, need never depend on another for sustenance.

The children bring with them samples of fruit and vegetables that are not up to the standard, and they carry specimens of stunted plant life. "Uncle John" examines these and tells his young audience what is the matter with them and how to cure them. When the train stops at a town during school hours, the village school is invariably dismissed and the youngsters march to the station and board the train. Sometimes it is necessary to hold two sessions in order to accommodate all of the boys and girls, and those who are waiting are allowed to roam through the rest of the train with their elders.

The New York Central agricultural train is distinctive in that it is arranged to embrace the teaching of about everything a farmer might be interested in. A live cow, raised at Cornell University, is exhibited, together with a cow of more humble breeding, to show the result of model dairying. There is a poultry car where poultrying, from the egg to the pullet, is demonstrated. Market gardening in all its branches is taught, and even forestry.

State Foresters board the special in the lake regions where there is still plenty of forest property that can be preserved, and they also are called upon to talk to the children on their special subject. The principal lecturers on the train are professors from Cornell University; but the railroad employs other practical men with a knowledge of farming profits, to answer questions on purely commercial lines. In common with other railroads, it maintains experimental stations on abandoned farms, where new methods of culture are tried out and new kinds of plant life are experimented with.

A short time ago the Southern Railway donated a large farm to the State of South Carolina for an experiment station. In the East, the Delaware and Hudson Railway is showing farmers in a practical way how they can increase the agricultural output by taking over abandoned farms and rejuvenating them. The Long Island Railroad Company also has several experimental farms, where some new varieties of lettuce, cabbage and other vegetables, brought from China, have been raised with encouraging success.

The idea has been caught by the railroad people of England, but only to a limited extent. There, the National Poultry Organization Society has been traveling about in Western England and Wales, giving lectures on egg culture, and the railroads have kindly offered to carry the lecturers about at reduced rates. Looking to Church Union

IT is a healthy and encouraging sign of religious progress to note the cordiality with which the idea of a union of Christian churches is being taken up by the various denominations. Since the great "World Missionary Conference," a few months ago, nothing more significant has happened to show the strong trend toward Christian union than the recent action of the Protestant Episcopal Convention in appointing a commission looking to the calling of a world conference of Christian churches to discuss ways and means of joining forces "on questions pertaining to the faith and the order of the Church of Christ." Doubtless, many will call such a plan visionary and impractical. These objectors will point out that the inevitable tendency of such a movement would be to afford the larger denominations a chance of swallowing the smaller ones, and that, as has been the case in the Roman Church, religious freedom would be sacrificed on the altar of solidarity. We do not anticipate, in the present generation at least, that any scheme could be devised by human agency that would induce all sects or denominations to surrender their organic existence or their creed; but the time is surely coming when all who acknowledge Christ as the Head of the visible Church must not only hold in common the essentials of the faith, but must work harmoniously together for its propagation. Heretofore, denominational rivalry has frequently operated to the serious disadvantage of the cause at home and in the missionary field.

An Experiment in Happiness

IT is doubtful whether any one has ever succeeded in the deliberate pursuit of happiness. Shy and evasive, it is not to be caught in a trap. If it comes to us at all, it will do so of its own free will, and most likely as the reward of the performance of simple, everyday duties, which we had never suspected of having any special merit at all. A famous author writes of an experiment in his own life and how it resulted. He was successful, and the rewards of work which the world had stamped as brilliant, poured in upon him. But in his heart he was unsatisfied. He wearied of adulation, and of the ceaseless round of duties which society imposed upon him. He felt that the burden was a distasteful one, and that his life was filled with irksome tasks, much of which he regarded as unprofitable and time-wasting. So he resolved to seek seclusion, where, with his books and nature, he could devote himself uninterruptedly to the development of his best talents. He made his home on an island, lived on simple, rational lines, and was content to be a spectator and to "let the world go by."

But a time soon came when he found to his dismay that he had taken the wrong turning at the fork in the roads. Happiness avoided him; his soul was even less satisfied than before. He was "somebody" no longer, for he had withdrawn from the battle of life and was useless to himself and to others as well. He discovered that he had been mistaken in believing he could live "to himself alone," and he saw that the natural, divinely ordained role of a true man is to live for others, to be in, yet not of, the world, and to bear his share of the general burden cheerfully in the place wherein God had set him. His desertion was a delusion and a snare, and had taken him wholly out of the reach of happiness, which is only to be found in the path of duty.

Ourselves and Others

SOME of those readers who are sending us letters at this renewal season, so full of cordial appreciation that we blush to receive them, ask us just how THE CHRISTIAN HERALD compares with the leading magazines in regard to the monthly aggregate of reading matter presented. As every member of our Family Circle knows, it is our habit to avoid comparison with our neighbors; and besides, the magazines in question are the very flower of the popular literary monthlies. But waiving objections, we give below the figures which supply the information asked.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is issued 52 times a year, as against 12 issues for the monthlies; consequently THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has an average of 4 1-3 issues per calendar month. During September of this year, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD issues were:

Issue	Words per issue
Sept. 7,	45,288
" 14,	31,824
" 21,	44,676
" 28,	49,572
Add 1-3 issue	12,852
	184,212

During September three of the leading monthly magazines, McClure's, Everybody's and the American, contained an average of 125,147 words per issue.

Even excluding the fractional 1-3 issue (needed to make up the total 52 weekly issues), THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would still show a good round majority of 46,213 words over the average of each magazine. On the basis of the above figures this would represent an excess of 554,556 words in the whole year's issues, even counting only 48 numbers. But as there are 52 issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every year, its actual total annual excess over the average of the three magazines (assuming the four additional CHRISTIAN HERALD issues to aggregate only 171,360 words) is approximately 725,916, or 1,564 magazine columns, two columns being equivalent to one magazine page. Thus, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD prints annually enough words of pure reading matter apart from advertisements to fill nearly six extra monthly magazine issues precisely similar in size and in number of reading pages to the regular issues. To put the thing in a nutshell: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S 52 issues equal in reading matter nearly 18 monthly issues of the magazines that lead all the others in this particular respect. We like to be modest about these things, but it is just as well occasionally to be particular that our readers and all others who may join our big Family Circle in the coming weeks, should know and remember the facts. It's only a matter of words, of course; but words clothe ideas, and if the ideas are good, they deserve to be remembered.

The Danger Point in Spain

IT is fortunate for Spain and for Europe that the anticipated rising on the anniversary of Francisco Ferrer's death did not take place. That it would have happened but for the prompt measures adopted by Premier Canalejas, is almost certain. Alfonso, however, is made of sterner stuff than Manuel, and his people knew that he would not hesitate to take the field in person if a rising were attempted. His courage, together with the fact that the Spanish army is believed to be loyal to the monarchy, has won the respect of the people, and may save the crown. Although the Ferrer anniversary is past, Spain's trouble is by no means ended. The whole country is in a ferment of excitement, and unless the government acts with wisdom and moderation and enters on a course of much needed reforms, the deferred revolution may gather strength for a more favorable opportunity. Portugal's example, where the republicans waited over two years before maturing their plans, will doubtless be a valuable object-lesson to the Madrid Cabinet and may help it to weather the storm.

That Aeroplane Flight

EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has added to his laurels as a man of strenuous experiences by going up in an aeroplane. It happened on the aviation field at Kinloch, Mo., a few miles west of St. Louis, and it made so favorable an impression on the Colonel that his friends are apprehensive that he may be tempted to spend considerable time in aerial flights hereafter. It was an almost windless day and aeronautic conditions were perfect. The big, white-winged biplane had just descended from a beautiful flight, and when the aeronaut ventured to suggest that he would "like to have the Colonel for a passenger," Mr. Roosevelt promptly shed his overcoat, and borrowing a cap, stepped into the machine. He was literally in the air a moment later; but he kept a cool head and a tight grip on the rail, although he disengaged a hand occasionally to wave it at the spectators below. It was all s sudden that his friends had scarcely time to gas their surprise before the Colonel was sailing abov the track at a mile-a-minute gait. After a full la of the course, he descended lightly, shook the avia tor's hand with characteristic vigor and declare that it was "Great! first-class! the finest experienc I ever had!" He had already attained such height of eloquence in his Western tour addresses, that th aeroplane ascension was the most natural thing i the world under the circumstances. Mr. Roosevel was the first ex-president to go down in a sub marine and he is also the first to go up in an aerc plane. However his critics may disagree with hi on questions of philosophy or politics, they cannc deny him the possession of good old-fashioned Ame ican pluck.

Divine Healing

DIVINE healing has been very frankly discusse by the Protestant Episcopal Church Conve tion at Cincinnati, O., and it is now sought to giv the sanction of the church to the healing of the sic by prayer. When a report in favor of this ne departure—or rather of this return to apostol methods—was submitted by the commission of whic Bishop Gray is chairman, the convention becam alive with the keenest interest. In that report, was set forth that there was a "widespread desi and an earnest longing" for the recognition c prayer and symbolic anointing of the sick. It wa recommended that a special commission be appointe to draw up an "office for the unction of the sick, on strictly Scriptural lines. It was not intende however, that it should have the character of sacrament preceding death. The resolution wa adopted by a good majority. It is one of the signif cant signs of the times when churchmen in a Episcopal congress demand a return to the old fait and practice of apostolic days. It is now severa years since the ecclesiastical pendulum began t swing in this direction. We recall with what en thusiasm the "Emmanuel Movement" was haile and how the various "Faith Healing" organizatior were acclaimed almost as the exponents of a ne Gospel. Very little is heard of them now. All th evidence in the matter goes to show that while Go has his witnesses in every age—his heroes, martyr and saints—the gift of high and sacred spiritua powers is not to be grasped or exploited at will, an there is grave danger in forcing matters in tha direction. If we strive to do our duty as we unde stand it, following Christ humbly and faithfully, w shall receive the full measure of gifts for which w are capacitated. God is still, as of old, the hearc and answerer of believing prayer, and the promis to those who trust in him are still in force; but th highest gifts are not to be coerced by committees c conventions or from motives of ecclesiastical rivalry To claim more than this is to approach very near th danger line.

Automobile Service in War

OUR picture last week was that of the automobiles in the race for the Vanderbilt Cup on Long Island, which race was attended with such fatalities. The tragedies of the meet and the public sentiment awakened thereby compelled the management to call off the race for the International Golden Cup, set for October 15. Our picture to-day represents the automobile rendering service to the wounded on the battlefield, engaged in the task of saving rather than destroying life. The German army, which is thoroughly up to date, adopted new methods of removing the wounded during the recent manoeuvres. Of the two new ways of speedily conveying injured men to the hospital, that in which the motor car plays the chief part is the more obvious. The wounded are placed in the car in two layers. The canvas covering can be lowered to cover the car entirely. The more uncommon way calls for the use of two bicycles; the machines are fastened together by means of rigid iron bars; the stretcher itself is carried on leather straps, which, acting spring fashion, prevent the jolting of the patient. In the earlier savage stage of society, little care was taken of the enemies wounded except to see that their life was ended as quickly as possible, no mercy being shown the helpless; and there was very little preparation made for the care of the friends that were injured. First, men carried their comrades from the battlefield to care for them; then the stretcher was brought into use; then horse-ambulances were employed; and now cycles and motor cars are pressed into service by the modern Red Cross work of relief. The advance of our Christian civilization and the broadening of human brotherhood will make relief of the wounded in war impossible, as there will be no battlefields stained with blood. Care of the wounded in battle is mentioned in the Scriptures.

And he went with Joram the son of Ahab to the war against Hazael King of Syria in Ramoth-Gilead; and the Syrians wounded Joram. And King Joram went back to be healed in Jezreel of the wounds which the Syrians had given him. (II. Kings 8: 28,29.)

Automobile Humane Service in War Time

Boy Drowned in Reservoir

Joseph Plenty, nine years old, while playing Indian and undertaking to hide from the cowboys who were in pursuit of him, fell through the blow-off pipe of the old aqueduct in Highbridge Park, New York City, the other day, and was swept away to his death. He fell into the main pipe which supplies New York City with water, and was swept by a stream seven feet in diameter and fifty-three miles long at a fearful speed to his death. The Water Department immediately undertook the task of letting the water out of the reservoir so that the body of the boy could be secured. It was only after 93,000,000 gallons of water had been run off, that three men with high boots and rubber suits could risk the task of the rescue. They found the boy and with great difficulty made their way to a place of exit. They climbed up a certain distance on a ladder and a rope was let down from the top by which the body of the little boy was lifted out, and afterwards the rescuers were drawn up by the same rope. There was a double reasbn for the rescue of the body of the boy. It was necessary to prevent the pollution of the water supply, the fountain of life. The other was the precious value of the body of the dear little boy. Four hundred thousand tons of water, so hard to get, and so necessary in these times of drought in the city, were counted as nothing to the restoration of the form from which the fond spirit of the boy had gone. And if the body is so precious, how much more valuable the soul of a boy or girl, and how wise the church of to-day in paying so much attention to the salvation of the children! Christ in his teaching estimated the value of an immortal soul greater than the whole world beside as he asked:

What shall a man give in exchange for his soul? (Matt. 16: 26.)

Dine in Stable with Cows

As a match for the dog receptions and monkey dinners, some women of Chicago gave a luncheon the other day in a stable among the cows and calves. The affair took place in the stables on a farm near Elgin. Fifty cows eating their meal, stood a few feet away from the gorgeously decorated tables, and calves gamboled over the premises. A pet calf went to sleep in the middle of a beautifully decorated table, and continued its sweet slumber through the meal. There is no accounting for tastes, and people have a perfect right, so long as the entertainment be innocent, to act as foolishly as they may please, and yet this luncheon is but another reminder of the restlessness and emptiness often manifested by what is wrongly termed the highest society. There are people of wealth and culture who give sane entertainments which are their social duty. They embody in their domestic and social life the highest principles of rectitude, Christian benevolence and spiritual consecration. There are others of wealth and position who assume the social mastery of a community, who are loud and rude and vulgar in their social instincts and entertainments. The God-child was born in a stable because there was no room for him in the inn, and because he was a child of poverty. Those who have heard his teaching or partaken of his spirit can put their time and money to better advantage than to waste them on the empty, silly entertainments and amusements, and gilded vices of a fast modern society.

And she brought forth her firstborn son and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the inn. (Luke 2: 7.)

The Wayward Son

George W. Wilmust, eighty-four years old, complained to Magistrate O'Reilly in the Bedford Avenue Court, Brooklyn, that his boy was getting so bad that he could not handle him, and asked the authority of the justice in his behalf. The magistrate supposed from the father's story that if he should order the administering of a good spanking that would be all that would be necessary for the present. When the boy came to the bridge, the magistrate looked surprised and amused, for he saw before him Frank Wilmust, sixty-four years old, as the wayward boy. "I guess I won't order the spanking I was thinking of," the judge said with a smile, "somehow the use of a slipper at sixty-four seems unfit." The judge bound him over for a further hearing the next day, when he was placed under $200 bond to behave himself. The father's complaint was that his bad boy was drunken, worthless and troublesome. It is more than likely that if the old man had been a little more rigid in his parental discipline earlier in life, it might not have been necessary for him to go to the court to help him save his son. It is not fair to charge the profligacy of children on parents because the powerful temptations of life sweep to ruin many of the children of Christian homes and careful religious instruction, but still the rule holds good that the child well trained is likely to become the good and useful man or woman.

Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it. (Prov 22: 6.)

Nursed Aged Servant

Andrew Jackson Murray, ninety-three years old, a negro who had been a servant in the Hennen and Morris families for eighty years, was buried in the Morris tomb, near Hammond, La., not long ago. He had been an upright man and a devoted servant, and Mrs. John A. Morris and her two sons took personal care of and nursed him in his last illness. Murray was born in Tennessee, and during the reconstruction days served as assessor of Tangipahoa Parish, La., and as justice of the peace. This expression of the gratitude and affection of the Morris family for their old servant is beautiful, and reminds us of the kind treatment which should be given to the aged and which usually is given by devoted loved ones, and is also a type of the exquisitely tender care which the heavenly Father takes of his children as they pass down into old age and the tomb, answering the prayer of the psalmist:

Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when my strength faileth. (Ps. 71: 9.)

Colossal Religious Collections

The presentation of the united offering of the Woman's Auxiliary to the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church took place at the great ecclesiastical gathering at Christ's Church in Cincinnati the other day. Checks, drafts, bank notes and coin were heaped on the collection plates by women from all parts of the country, and when they were counted it was found that they amounted to the enormous total of $242,110.83. Never before has there been so large a basket collection taken at a single service in America. This is a triennial offering, and amounts to $20,000 more than the one given three years ago. Two days after this great collection Rev. A. B. Simpson, pastor of the Gospel Tabernacle in New York City, preached the annual missionary sermon at the New York Convention of the Christian and Missionary Alliance in the Tabernacle and made a strong appeal for missionary funds, obtaining at the morning and evening services about $60,000 in pledges and cash. Two tellers noted the pledges as they were called off by Dr. Simpson. As Dr. Simpson called out the $5,000 amount, the choir interrupted with the hymn, "Blessed Is the Name of the Lord." After other amounts had been announced the choir broke out into the song "Bringing in the Sheaves." Such hymns as "I Will Ask the Lord to Bless Them," "There Will Be Many Stars in My Crown," "Launch Out Into the Deep," "Throw Out the Life Line," were sung through the service as the subscription was going on. The intensest enthusiasm prevailed, and hallelujahs were frequently heard. One of the brightest signs of this money-getting age is that it is a money-giving age, and more and more the people who have means, whether little or much, are recognizing their stewardship to their Divine Lord. Such large generosity is not only the effect of a deep spiritual loyalty, but will also be the cause of a larger measure of religious prosperity to the individual and the church. The prophet expressly promises a large measure of spiritual blessing to those who are generous to God with their material gifts.

Bring ye all the tithes into the store house, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it. (Mal. 3: 10.)

PORTUGAL EXPELS THE MONKS

ALTHOUGH order has not been completely restored in Portugal, the situation is gradually quieting down. Preparations are being made by the new government for the elections, when it is expected that a new President and Cabinet will be chosen for the Republic. Lisbon is well prepared for defense against a possible Royalist attack, and every precaution has been taken to prevent the success of any sudden reactionary movement. Overtures may be made to induce ex-King Manuel to sign a formal renunciation of the crown. Several nuns, driven insane by the fighting in the streets and the subsequent dangers, are said to have committed suicide.

There is a strict censorship exercised over the press at the capital, and correspondents who wish to send news of the actual situation are obliged to cross the border to telegraph their messages. Some of the correspondents write that the conduct of the populace toward the monks has been needlessly severe. The attacks on the religious orders continue. Search is being made in the cellars of the monasteries, to "smoke out" the monks.

Thus far the new government has shown itself able to afford protection to all foreigners. British and American warships are anchored in the Tagus for the preservation of order. Generous political amnesty has been granted by the government, and this popular step has aided in strengthening the hands of the provisional cabinet. All the legal obligations of the government are recognized. Liberty of the press has been guaranteed. Men who have been prominent in opposing the republic will be leniently dealt with, probably with a few exceptions.

One thing seems to be thoroughly settled. It is the policy of the new régime to absolutely separate Church and State, to take away all the special privileges formerly enjoyed by the religious orders and to put their members on the same footing as other citizens.

Ex-King Manuel, his mother and grandmother, during their stay at Gibraltar, were a most grief-stricken group. They were quartered in the Governor's house, as the guests of Sir Archibald Hunter, and sentries guarded them to insure them against attack. Manuel, in conversation with a newspaper correspondent in the presence of the Governor, said that he felt keenly the disgrace of having been driven like a criminal from his own country.

"Had parliament decreed a republic, I would have accepted it," he said, "but I have no heart to fight the plots that were going on. I cannot believe that it is the wish of the people to destroy the monarchy."

There has been some talk of Manuel and his mother seeking a permanent refuge at the Villa Marique, near Seville, in Spain, on an estate belonging to the Countess of Paris, the mother of Amelie. This is not far from the Portuguese border, and there they could await events and be ready to take advantage of any turn in the tide of fortune. The old grandmother, ex-Queen Maria Pia, is in her dotage, and does not realize what has happened. She will find a home in Italy.

It is evidently the purpose of the Provisional government to drive the monks and nuns out of the country. Orders have been issued expelling the Jesuits and the foreign members of the religious orders, but the native members, if they resign from the orders and return to their families, will be permitted to stay in the country. There is a great exodus of members of the various orders now in progress. Under the decree of expulsion, all the property of the Jesuits reverts to the State. In some of the convents, the authorities found large quantities of arms. It is understood that many of the nuns will go to America.

Lisbon, enthroned upon its "seven hills" and a few others not mentioned for lack of space in the guide books, has come out of the mist of history in which, so far as Americans are concerned, it has stood for generations, and becomes all at once a place of interest in the current news of the day. Lisbon was the great centre of the recent revolution, and the success of the revolt within its boundaries settled the fate of the monarchy before other parts of Portugal were heard from, much as was the case in Paris during the days of the French Revolution. There has been very little connection politically or commercially between the United States and Portugal. Even our globe-trotting citizen, when he gets to the Iberian peninsula at all, usually travels about in Spain, unmindful of the fact that in Portugal he would find beautiful cities, fine scenery and a people whose customs cannot fail to appeal to his taste for "old-world customs" and what he considers the unusual. There are very few Americans in Oporto, the main seaport, or in Lisbon, the capital; but there is a large English colony, and the business relations of Portugal and England have been growing for two hundred years. One English-Portuguese firm dates from 1687, and is now doing a business of several millions a year. It is an interesting historical fact that it was the fishermen of northern Portugal who started and developed the fishing industry on the "Banks" off the northern coast of America, and though they now send fewer ships their taste for salt cod from Newfoundland is unabated; in fact, it is a natural Portuguese dainty. It is found in every little grocery shop, hard and brown as a board. It is an odd coincidence that quite a number of Portuguese have settled on Cape Cod in Massachusetts, though there they are more interested in farming and the cranberry bogs than in the cod on which Massachusetts based its prosperity for generations. A number have made their home on the islands to the south of the mainland of Massachusetts and there the dark eyes of the Iberian maiden, raven locks and a certain picturesque element in dress are not infrequent. This connection with Portugal dates back many years, the ships of Martha's Vineyard bridging the distance over sea and returning with Portuguese crews.

The Noon Hour in a Lisbon Square

Lisbon is a thriving city and has been growing rapidly. In fact, street after street has reached out into the country in a way quite American. Despite this rapid growth, the city fathers have been wise enough to have civic improvements and beauty keep pace with it, and new avenues and parks have been laid out. One of the handsomest of these is the Parque Eduardo VII., named in honor of the late King of Great Britain, who enjoyed great popularity in Portugal, being regarded as a firm friend of the country. The ancient and modern modes of life are strongly intermingled in Lisbon. Recently the richer inhabitants have developed a passion for owning motor cars in a way which reminds the traveler of Detroit, Mich. The number of cars seen about the streets is a cause of wonderment, especially when one considers that Lisbon is not well adapted to motoring, with its twisted and steep streets. In fact, in several places the people go from one quarter of the city to another by means of elevators set in steel cages, getting transfer tickets from the tram-car conductors to connect with other lines. Nevertheless the Portuguese of the upper class must have his car, though its purchase may have deprived the owner of all his other luxuries, and it is even rumored that he sometimes goes without his dinner that his hungering car may have its fill of gasoline. It must not be supposed that there are not many who can afford such luxuries. On the contrary the country is fairly prosperous, though the government was poor. There are quite a number of millionaires; one lady, who died a short time ago, was worth fifteen millions. There are many rich merchants and there are also a great many wealthy families from Brazil, who have come back to the land of their ancestors to make their permanent home. To get rich in Brazil and come back is the dream of thousands of Portuguese peasants.

In strikingly odd contrast to the rush and "honk" of the automobiles, and the clang of the trolley cars, are the saloio, or small farmers who ride nonchalantly through the twentieth century hubbub on the back, the extreme back, of small patient-eyed mules. Though the country has progressed, and the farmers are progressing toward prosperity, they have consistently refused to move farther forward on the mule's back in Portugal, than the last fifth of his anatomy. Perhaps the custom arose from the time when the mule carried a large load just before the rider, and the habit has not been broken.

The novelty of costume in the streets of Lisbon strikes the eye of the artistically inclined traveler and makes him thankful that there are some parts of Europe where dress has not assumed a monotonous uniformity. The young men in society have their clothes cut on English models, while the ladies follow the fashions of Paris. The man of the lower class, while not so picturesque as his country relatives, yet makes part of a fascinating picture in his drooping felt hat, his coat swung at a rakish angle over one shoulder. Sometimes he wears a brightly colored sash about his waist and has a blue or red cap in place of the hat. Sailors from the port have bright handkerchiefs knotted about their heads and one glances down to his belt expecting to see the brass hilt of a cutlass, so much do they look like some ancient mariners from the days when the galleons of Portugal were known on every sea, and the merchantman was half a corsair, with the chance of booty as well as barter ever in his eye.

One thing, however, strikes the visitor, and most pleasantly. The Portuguese is good-natured and usually polite. The policeman will direct you carefully to the place whither you wish to go, the conductors on the trolley cars are models of their kind.

Chavez in His Fatal Flight Over the Alps

WHEN George Chavez started on his daring flight over the Alps his friends who saw him start felt that he was taking one of the worst risks ever braved by an aeronout. Their fears were justified, for he died a victim to the modern craze for flying over everything which would daunt all birds of the air except the eagle. The photograph shows Chavez well on his journey when he still thought he would pass safely to his journey's end. He was fatally injured by a fall of thirty feet while attempting to make a landing for oil. Yet a short time before he had passed in safety over the towering peaks of the Simplon.

REVIVAL AT THE BOWERY MISSION

THE fall and winter work of the Bowery Mission has just commenced by the holding of a week's revival services conducted by the Rev. Dr. John G. Hallimond, the superintendent. Mission workers are permitted to see many things that are hidden from popular view; some of these represent great facts connected with the preaching of the Gospel, while others, but for the all-potent influence of the grace of God, would strike terror to the stoutest heart.

Preparation for a season of revival had been made by earnest prayer and intercession that God would richly bless them, and in them manifest his power and salvation. These prayers have been abundantly answered beyond all expectation. In impassioned words and by direct appeal, each speaker spoke to the men's hearts by the memory of a mother's faith, their own conscious weakness, and the remarkable living testimonies of the large number who had given their hearts to God and abandoned the old life, and were now bringing forth fruit, some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundredfold.

One of the striking features of the services was the entire absence of transient, emotional enthusiasm. Perhaps this is to be expected, in such large gatherings of men as assembled nightly in the large hall of the Mission. There was enthusiasm, but it was of a steady flow, of an abiding nature, revealing deep earnestness. The leading thought and spirit was prayer; in fact it was the very atmosphere of the place. Nor was the idea of prayer of an indefinite nature; repeated by every speaker, emphasis was laid on the necessity on the part of the men of not fighting one special besetting sin alone, such as drink, but of a complete change and surrender of the heart to God, and not only of saving one's self but to be of use and not a hindrance to others. This idea of whole-hearted definiteness of purpose naturally resulted from the spirit of prayer and consecration which pervaded all the services. Much lasting good has unquestionably been done among the vast number of houseless, homeless, friendless men for whom they were held.

The services commenced on Sunday morning, October 2, at Mrs. Sarah J. Bird's meeting. Mrs. Bird is known as the "Mother of the Bowery Men," and nothing does she appreciate more than to be called "Mother Bird." She is a mother indeed to the men, for by her self-sacrificing life, her sweetness and graciousness of manner, her belief that there is some good which may be found and brought out in the case of even the most desperate and hopeless, she has for many years endeared herself to all whose privilege it is to come into contact with her. Night after night, at these meetings, her presence was one of the special sources of inspiration and encouragement.

Long before the time appointed for the services to commence, a great line of men might be seen outside the Mission, anxiously waiting for the doors to be opened. When the crowds were admitted Dr. Hallimond, on one evening, gave a stirring and most suitable and inspiring talk to the men on "Hope." The other speakers during the week were the Rev. Dr. George Clarke Peck, of St. Andrew's Methodist Episcopal Church; the Rev. Thomas S. Bond, of Morris Heights Methodist Episcopal Church; the Rev. W. R. Lane of London, England, who comes to assist Dr. Wilbur Chapman in his great evangelistic campaign in the West, and who came direct from his steamer in which he had crossed the Atlantic to the Mission; the Rev. Stephen Merritt, father-in-law of the late president of the Mission, Dr. Louis Klopsch; and the Rev. Charles E. Stowe, D.D., son of the late Harriet Beecher Stowe. All of these gave most suitable and stirring addresses, and the results, when the invitation was given, were most encouraging. Rev. W. R. Lane spoke on Thursday, Friday and Saturday and the most striking of his addresses was the second—"Old Humbug"—in which he described an old sheep which was kept by a butcher in a small plot of grass, adjoining the house of a friend of Mr. Lane, with whom he had stayed a few days before he left England. In this plot the butcher kept a dozen or more sheep, ready for the slaughter-house. All he had to do was to call "Old Billy" and he and the other sheep would follow the butcher to the slaughter-house, where, the others safely inside, "Old Billy" would return to his pasture. From "Old Humbug" Mr. Lane drew the lesson how a man may lead others down to their doom or on to the right.

Rev. Stephen Merritt, who spoke on Friday evening (it being just six months since the death of Dr. Klopsch), for over an hour kept the rapt attention of the men. It was truly an impressive sight to sit and listen, as this venerable and honored servant of God talked to the men of the wonderful power of God and the most signal answers to prayer as experienced in his own long life, and, notably, as he told of the conversion of three great workers for God recently called home to their reward, namely, the late John S. Huyler, C. N. Crittenton and Louis Klopsch.

Dr. C. E. Stowe, who was accompanied by his son, Lyman Beecher Stowe, was the speaker morning and evening, and, as usual, gave two addresses specially adapted to the men of the Bowery. These were the last addresses of the series, and concluded one of the most remarkable weeks in the history of the Bowery Mission.

Dr. Hallimond was aided most willingly throughout by the regular leaders and workers. During the week, 320 men came forward and took the card pledging themselves to lead a new life. Most of those who came forward joined the Brotherhood. Not a man was promised a reward, in the way of a bed or a meal ticket, although the Mission is always ready to help men who are in absolute need.

The Mission Brotherhood room was crowded each evening, and the hearty singing, like that of the men in the larger meetings, was inspiring. A touching incident may be told in connection with this. A poor man, who had gone to bed in a large lodging-house next door, heard the men of the Brotherhood singing. He was arrested by the words of the song, got up, dressed himself, came in to the meeting, and was one of those who came forward when the usual invitation was given.

Many remarkable conversions of men from all walks in life might be recounted as the result of this week of special effort.

WHAT WILL JAPAN DO IN KOREA?

Christian appeal than either Japanese or Chinese. They have grasped the concept of Christianity in a more fundamental way than the Japanese have done. This is the almost universal testimony of those who are cognizant of the facts. The fellowship and the evangelistic spirit of Christianity, as exhibited in Korea, have led people to surmise that even that despised little nation holds in her hand an immense potentiality for good in the Orient.

Compare Korea and Judea in this respect. God established and developed Judaism for a specific purpose. That purpose did not include the perpetuity of the Jewish people as a political entity, but made them the starting point of a world-wide evangelism, a radiating centre of Christian civilization. And it was only after Rome had humbled her in the dust and trodden her under foot, that the beauty and the dignity of her calling became apparent. These words seem to fit the case of Korea almost equally well. During the past five years of constant pressure and repeated encroachment upon the political life of Korea, the advance of Christianity has been peculiarly rapid. The Christian Church here has not been involved in the political struggle, but it has gone steadily on its way, winning men to Jesus Christ. The very year which beheld the extinction of Korea's national life saw also the most remarkable advance in Christian propagandism that the history of missions can show.

Christianity has made great advance in Japan, but it has never captured the imagination of the classes of that country as is the case in Korea, and the Japanese control of Korea is not at all a Christian one. The religion of Jesus Christ is no secondary issue in Korea, but it has become an essential element in society. It has taken firm root and is fast becoming a dominant force. What Korea needs is friends, and in the selection of friends she looks to those who are genuinely helpful. It cannot be truthfully said that Japan has exerted any considerable moral force for good in that country. The methods of the transition and the comparatively small response that Japan has made to the higher wants of the Korean people, have not commended the Japanese régime to them. To the age-long feud which has existed between the two nations must be added the unveiled contempt with which the Japanese look upon the Koreans. What Japan needed and still needs is the goodwill of the Peninsular people; but she has taken no pains to see that such relations should be amicable. At the point of contact, therefore, there is the bitterest hatred on the one hand, and the most scornful contempt on the other. It is my opinion that the true relations between any two nations can be best studied at the point where the individuals of one come into close contact with those of the other in everyday life. Judged by this standard, there is much left to be desired; and in saying this I am putting it in the mildest possible way.

The Koreans are so constituted that no merely superficial change can possibly commend itself to them. Many times in their history they have attempted such changes, but always with the most unsatisfactory results. They have learned better, and they will now accept no change that does not promise a fundamental reform. They admit that the Japanese have done many wonderful things and have effected many startling changes; but they do not believe that Japan has gotten to the bed-rock of Western civilization, nor ever will, until the revolution shall show signs of being a moral, as well as a merely material one. The treatment they have received at the hands of Japan has not as yet warranted them in placing faith in the moral quality of Japan's promises. So far as the Korean people have at all decided to effect the regeneration of their nation, they have begun it by accepting and adopting the very basis of Western culture, which is Christianity.

The Korean does not often formulate his ideas, but underneath the surface, perhaps only subconsciously, they realize that Japanese feudalism, which lies at the root of all her military and social achievements, is a feudalism without chivalry. It is lacking in that altruism which made Europe a willing missionary to the whole world. They believe that Japan has accepted only those forces which will make for physical power. Whether they are right in this, the world must decide for itself. I only state the fact that the Koreans so believe.

But the Christian Church goes straight on its way, neither favoring nor opposing the physical power of Japan. This is exceedingly distasteful to the Japanese authorities. Time and again, they have approached the missionaries and tried to get them to come out squarely in favor of the usurpation; but they have succeeded in only a very few cases, and even in these cases there has been a significant drawing back. The missionaries cannot be blamed for refusing to take sides; for if they declared for Japan, they would immediately lose all influence over the people. They must remain neutral. The time may come when Japan will insist that the Christian Church in Korea come out flat-footed, either for or against the physical masters of

An Attack Upon the Nursery

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WRITING in a London periodical a learned philosopher has recently made an attack upon the nursery. He would have it abolished as tending to the deterioration of juvenile character. To a certain extent Professor Emil Reich is in the right. When little children in the most impressionable years of life, the years between infancy and the schoolroom, are left in the care of ignorant hirelings while their mothers are engaged elsewhere, a serious mistake is made. The nursery, as we understand it, and as the mothers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family regard it, is not the place to which children are sent to be out of their mother's way. It is usually a sunny room, fitted with everything pleasant for children, equipped with toys, furnished with picture books and made ideally delightful. Here the mother is often with the children, and when she is not with them they are usually with her, the nursery being a convertible term, when it suits the mother's convenience, for the kitchen and the living-room.

The first seven years of life are those in which character receives its trend. Plato among the ancients understood this, and strongly urged upon the people of his time the importance of child culture from the earliest age. A great deal is said and done to-day with reference to the early education of our boys and girls. The kindergarten receives them before they are old enough to go to the primary school. No one who has not studied the conditions of life among the poor in our cities can understand what a boon the kindergarten is to the little children whose only play place is the street, and whose mothers are too busy or too ignorant to care for them properly. I may be permitted to doubt whether the children of comfortable homes are not quite as well off educationally, if their mothers live with them, teach them and shape them during the first seven years, as if they were sent to any school. In an argument against Woman's Suffrage Mr. G. K. Chesterton, who is always worth listening to, whether one agree with him or not, says that babies are not taught trades; they are introduced to the universe. It is the mother who performs the introduction.

Every one has heard what Napoleon said when asked what France needed most. "Mothers," was his reply. Every one knows that God and mother have the first chance and the first claim in the moulding of the new human being who arrives helpless and naked in the world, to be clothed upon and trained as the mother under God pleases.

Do not give up your nursery, dear mother. If you can spare a room for the children, by all means do so. If not, let your nursery be wherever you are, and let no one else supersede you in the early training of the girls and boys.

The City Beautiful A suggestion comes to us from a correspondent, Mr. Frederick A. Riehle, that it would be a desirable thing to interest children and young people, as well as some older people of leisure, in the organization of a league or society to be called The City Beautiful. Pointing out the contrast between American cities and those on the continent of Europe, our friend urges greater tidiness on our part. His idea is that a reward might be offered to children by older members of such a society, if they would take pains to keep the sidewalks in front of houses and the street beyond the curb free from bits of paper and other unsightly débris. The street sweepers remove only the surface dirt and do not accomplish work of making the city attractive. In nearly all our suburban towns the women of the place are organized for this very purpose; receptacles are provided in convenient localities for everything that would litter the street, and it is regarded as a misdemeanor for any one, old or young, to throw apple cores, orange skin, torn letters or old newspapers where they would detract from the order and beauty of the town. In our cities, the rush of travel, the hurrying automobiles and heavily laden trucks would make it unsafe for children to venture beyond the curb, or for old men and women to do so for any purpose except that of fleeing to safety to the opposite side of the street. We have great pleasure, however, in giving room to our correspondent's suggestion.

MAKERS OF RAIN

Isn't this jolly to sit in a shower,
Seeing the drip of the beautiful rain?
Mother in haste will deplore all the waste,
And send the boys in to their lessons again.

Tools for the Boys Most boys are fond of tools. It is by no means necessary to buy an expensive chest fitted out with a variety of tools, to give great pleasure to the ordinary boy. He should have a hammer and nails, a saw, a gimlet and one or two other useful articles, and, if possible, a place where he may use them. The boy who enjoys making things should have something on which he may exercise his special faculty. The boat which a boy makes for himself, the book-shelves with which he fits his own room, the bird box which he nails on a tree as a refuge for birds in the winter, whatever, in short, he makes himself furnishes him with wholesome occupation and assists him in becoming deft in the use of his hands. If a boy does not care for tools, they should not be forced upon him. There are boys to whom books to read are of much more worth than either toys or tools.

He Sendeth His Rain Although there have been floods in other parts of the world, in a large portion of the United States there has been so little rain during the summer and autumn that the water supply is failing in many places. By the time this meets the eye of the reader the windows of heaven may have opened and the needed and desired rain have fallen to fill the streams, feed the reservoirs and refresh the thirsty earth. It was written of old concerning our loving Father that "he sendeth his rain on the just and the unjust." Modern science has accomplished marvelous feats, but the great elemental gifts coming to us straight from a divine hand are independent of science. The winds, the clouds, the light of sun and stars and the rain in its season reach us evermore through the ages unchanged from the Creator of this universe. Do we recognize this fact, and are we thankful as we should be that he "neither slumbers nor sleeps"? Acknowledging his bounty and submitting to his will, do we pray that he will continue to send us the rain and the sunshine, as it may please him?

Play, Work, Rest The last words of Mark Twain, who was no doubt wandering in thought to the days of his childhood, were "There is nobody to play with me any more." More than most men, this beloved humorist kept the child-heart through the years of a long life. He could be easily moved to tears or to laughter, and his sympathies were swift and deep. Throughout his whole life he never shirked hard work and he always loved to play. He did both with all his might. In old age, with so many of his dear ones gone, he must often have felt that there was no one left for the intimacy of play. We need, all of us, play-time and rest-time quite as really as work-time. Our American habit is to exalt work as if it were the only good, to frown upon play as if it were merely for the juveniles, and to ignore the need of rest. So it happens that sometimes our loving Father, seeing that we require rest and refuse to take it, sends us an opportunity which we label "illness" or "infirmity." Let us accept the privilege of rest as cheerfully as the obligation to labor and the recess, when we go out to play. There are times when rest is more than mere physical recuperation; it is intellectual and spiritual strength and invigoration.

Women in Council A friend who has been tormented all summer by hordes of ants which have destroyed her plants and flowers, asks for help to prevent the disappointment another season. This lady raised beautiful plants from seeds and duly set them in her garden borders, only to have them completely ruined by the marauding ants.

Another correspondent seeks advice from successful raisers of poultry. She has had failure upon failure in the management of incubators. If any practical woman whose success in raising chicks by artificial means has been pronounced, will send a bit of advice to this friend, it shall have a place in this column.

Nightfall and Moonrise

By MYRTA LOCKETT AVARY

ck-a-by, baby, thy cradle is green, pa's a nobleman, mamma's a queen, ster's a lady and wears a gold ring, hnnie's a drummer and drums for the king!

SITTING in her doorway and crooning the old lullaby, she rocked her baby to sleep. As she cked and sang she knit, the rhythical click of her needles supplying companiment to the rocking and the ooning. After the manner of expert itters, she did not watch her needles. Her eyes were lifted to the tender irple of the skies; they dwelt upon e cradle; they probed the forest ooms; or they sought the turning of e road with patient expectancy and arning.

Phœbe's days were all alike. Expt for baby, she had been alone since nrise. She was up with the dawn, oking breakfast and milking tho w while her husband and brother d and watered the mules. While her en breakfasted she was occupied in rving them, and in making ready eir dinner-buckets when, as now, eir work took them to distant fields. fter they were gone she urried through with her nely meal, washed the shes and put them in the pboard; made up the beds id tidied the house. Her renoon was crowded with sy tasks. The darling one as bathing baby and laying m aside for his morning p. Duly the milk was urned, the chickens were d, the sitting hens looked ter, and hawks warned ay. Always there was wing in plenty for Phœbe's ithful needle, which fashned and repaired, and tched beyond belief, the parel of her household. me the long silent waning the day toward the nightll; came the knitting, the nging and the waiting.

The road on which the cotge faced was little used, ing rather a rustic lane an a public thoroughfare. et sometimes a stranger—me one from a neighboring unty or from a distant part the State on prospecting or her business bent—passed hœbe's door. Now and then, neighbor—the section was arsely settled and a "neighr" might live many miles ay—would come along. he advent of a wayfarer as always an event of mark Phœbe's day. Rarely would fail to pause, asking for a ink of water; and he would ceive a proffer of milk from Phœbe's spitable hand. Whoever he might , he would likely be drawn into a at; if such a treasure as a bit of ssip was in his possession it would rely be extracted from him; and rely he would deliver up any fragnt of news he might have from the g outside world. If he chanced to 've a newspaper with him he was re to part with it, beguiled thereto Phœbe's transparent diplomacy.

And the newspaper—no manner of rd experience would teach Phœbe to ad that before her men came home. was laid away for the evening hour, e hour of family reunion. And tho nclusion of the whole matter was at Joe kept one sheet and gave Ben e other, and the two men read in ence, with an occasional remark to ch other, until they got too sleepy read, when they tossed the paper wn and went to bed. Perhaps they ought that Phœbe did not like readg, if they thought at all of the sition; if she liked to read, why give em the paper? Besides, she had had all afternoon. After a question or two, artfully designed to convert the reading into a common pleasure and interchange of ideas, Phœbe would relapse into silence where she sat in her corner, rocking the cradle, knitting, patching, darning.

Once every few months, Betsy Brown, Phœbe's nearest woman neighbor, living three miles away, would come to spend the day. The days of Betsy's visits Phœbe marked with a white stone. Such confabs they had! such nice times exchanging new stitches in knitting and crochet, and new recipes for jams and preserves! "Cousin Harriet" in the city sent Phœbe now and then a woman's magazine, which was the joy and pride of Phœbe's life; and Betsy Brown's niece, who was a postmistress somewhere, sent Betsy occasional offerings of like character, marked "Sample Copy." The senders little realized what a large and active part their casual contributions played in the still current of two lives. Betsy's inspection of Phœbe's garden and chickens was a thing to be looked forward to and looked back upon by Phœbe. When night came after one of Betsy's visits Phœbe would have a fund of such local news as there was stored up for Joe and Ben—if Joe and Ben would listen.

All her pleasure in hearing, seeing, thinking—even as in the performance of daily service—was bound up in hoped-for division with the two who, with her baby, made her world. The sadness of it was that her hope was so rarely fulfilled.

Joe and Ben came home at night usually too tired or sleepy to listen or respond to her remarks or advances. Only the rare accident of a stranger dropping in could stimulate their sluggish interest or arouse them from their torpor. Sometimes they had animated discussions with each other, but as a rule, they had talked themselves out in the field.

The longest and busiest day never found her too tired to listen or talk to them if she could make a chance for either. The things which Phœbe had treasured up to tell them, but which had never been told, would fill more books than one. The reason why she still retained hope, why she had not become utterly disheartened, was that she believed the fault lay in herself, and believing this, she felt that her continued effort must at length discover and establish a plane of common interest between herself and her men.

To-night she had a wonderful exploit of baby's to relate. She was sure it would excite the interest of his uncle and father, as she thought it over, smiling to herself. Then, there was the unfolding of her plan for making money wherewith to send baby to school. She had been full of this plan ever since the arrival of a letter from Cousin Harriet, who told how expensive everything was in the city. Eggs cost twenty cents a dozen and upwards in the town where Cousin Harriet dwelt. A golden future for baby unrolled itself before his mother when she thought of that—with her hens cackling merrily in the barn and roundabout. She had been receiving five to ten cents for her eggs at the village store—and that in trade.

Her problem was to get her eggs to the town in which Cousin Harriet lived. A big problem for Phœbe! She needed Joe's intellect to bear upon it. And Joe's co-operation was an essential. "If I could only walk all the way and carry them every week!" thought Phœbe. She had been watching and waiting for her opportunity to talk this matter over with Joe, boiling her facts and ideas down, after the manner of newspaper paragraphists, to the fewest and most pleasing words possible. Meanwhile, her thrifty hens rewarded her excellent care by laying many eggs, and the accumulating product, packed in salt and stored in the cellar, reproached her with her unfulfilled duty and laggard enterprise. Her tender conscience smote her when she looked in her baby's face. Yet she shrank from speaking, fearing to have her scheme killed by her own poor way of setting it forth. Ah, why could she never speak what she wished and as she wished, and in a way that would win or command respectful hearing and attention? What was wrong with her? Her soul arraigned her for the burial of thoughts useful and beautiful—messages of God—which she would have been better and happier for imparting and her men the better and happier for receiving. Had she only the gift—the courage—the power—the mystic something which enables one to utter the word that will be heard!

Rose and purple had faded from the sky, and it was softly, darkly blue now. The great harvest moon rolled up, red as blood but paling by degrees into resplendent silver. In the woods a whippoorwill was calling, and another whippoorwill answered him from afar. Across the road, a calf looked through the bars and lowed. He knew it was milking time and his mother had not come. That morning, "Dilsey," as Phœbe called his mother, had gone away at the end of a rope with Joe and Ben to a fresh pasture near the field in which they were working. On their way back, they would let Dilsey out, and she would come home fast enough without leading!

Katydids sang in the treetops. In and out of fence corners and about the bushes, fireflies flashed. In the rosevine over the door a mockingbird sang full and sweet, but intermittently, as in a dream.

The woods were full of voices.

A partridge called "Bob White!" and was answered by a cry as plaintive as his own. A dove cooed for its mate, and the mate cooed in response. As they sought each other through the woods, their calls grew nearer, each to each, until lost in one note.

As Phœbe listened, her lullaby fell to a lower and tenderer key, the yearning deepened in her eyes. Baby was asleep She took the light shawl from her shoulders and laid it over him.

The tinkling of a cowbell down the lane admonished Phœbe that Dilsey was coming to her calf. Phœbe rose, crossed the lane hastily, and let down the bars for the calf, realizing the next moment that this was a blunder, for Bonny would now get more than his share of milk. But Phœbe was not properly sorry, for was not Dilsey a mother and Bonny Dilsey's baby? Yet Phœbe hastened into the house for her pail, and soon settled to her milking, with Bonny, to his exuberant dissatisfaction, on the other side of the bars.

Soon the wagon appeared in the dusk at the end of the lane, the mules drawing it lazily. Joe walked beside it, dragging his whip. Ben was sprawled atop the hay; Phœbe could not see him there, but she knew; Ben never missed a hay-ride.

The men watered and fed the stock. Then they separated Dilsey and Bonny for the night, in spite of vigorous protests from both. Meanwhile, Phœbe made ready the supper. The table was set forth with its coarse white cloth, cheap plates and cutlery and a jug of molasses. Poor as it all was, that table shone with the high purpose of a clean soul and the fine order of a poetic spirit. A pat of butter and a pitcher of milk were brought from the spring. Eggs and bacon, fried in a skillet over the coals, and biscuit and hoecake, completed the meal.

The cradle had been pushed into its corner. A clothes-horse, converted into a screen, had been drawn between the cradle and the lighted candle on the table. Baby slept, undisturbed by his mother's light journeyings to and fro, or by the splutterings of the candle in the soft summer wind which stole gently in and out from door to window.

Phœbe heard the men exchanging some remarks as they approached the house. They washed their faces and hands in the basin on the shelf just outside the door, and dried them with the towel hanging from a nail in the wall.

"Supper ready, Phœbe?" called Joe.

"All ready!" sang Phœbe. "You all ready?"

"You kin bet!" answered Ben.

They came in, sat down and ate in silence. She put a kindly inquiry about their day's work, and made some light comment on her own. Silence answered her.

"You all tired?" she ventured timidly.

"You might know we was," said Joe.

She felt something humid in the air which kissed her cheek, and looked uneasily out of the open door and windows, and back to the faces of her men; then she spoke her fear that it would rain before the hay was in, and her hope that it would not.

"There's a white rim round the moon," she said. It was an ill augury, but she felt its beauty.

"We see it," said Joe.

Yes, they saw the moon shining in the heavens, with all that rain-promising white halo around it. They looked through the windows and doors, following Phœbe's glance, then back to their plates. If it was going to rain, it would rain. There was no putting a stop to it. There was no use talking about it.

Thus they met her attempts at conversation with a look or a word, or without any sign. It was not that they were angry or sullen, nor in even so positive a humor as being bored. Phœbe was a matter of course. It was one of her ways, they took it, to talk a little at mealtimes; and no harm came of it. They were used to hearing her talk without paying attention to what she said. They might have missed it if she had stopped talking, for they loved her in their way.

To-night she began to feel, as often before, that she was saying foolish and idle things. Then she found that she herself was taking no interest in what she said, and that she was not saying what she had meant to say. Then she was silent. There was no sound at the table but the click of knives and forks and the chewing and swallowing of food.

Phœbe rose softly, went to the cradle and moved the screen so as to shade the baby better. Bending, she kissed the little hand lying upon the coverlet. The baby cooed in his sleep, and a smile, sweet and beautiful, lit up his mother's face.

Joe and Ben called simultaneously for milk, and she hastened to replenish their glasses.

When supper was finished, Ben climbed into the loft where he slept.

"I've got to go to the barn and git some terbacker," said Joe.

While he was gone, Phœbe hurried through with the washing of the dishes, oven, and skillet; covered the coals with ashes to keep them alive for starting the breakfast fire; tied a fresh apron around her waist, folded a spotless kerchief about her neck, and took up her knitting. When he returned, she was ready to open her plan for converting her eggs into gold for baby's education; her words were chosen—just the right words to arouse his interest and enlist his sympathy and co-operation.

But he was in such haste to get to rest that before she could gather courage to speak, he had pulled his clothes off and cast himself on the bed. Swiftly she put out her candle, slipped out of her dress, drew the cradle to the side of the bed, and lay down.

"Joe," she began, "I want to tell you——"

Suddenly, she raised herself and looked at him. She bent her face over his. When she lifted it, interest and eagerness had died out, and patience—or apathy the counterfeit of patience—had taken their place.

There was something "out to the barn" besides "terbacker."

With this "something" left in or out, to-night was a type of all the nights of Phœbe's life as it had been and would be until—when?

Overhead, Ben snored audibly. By her side, lay her husband in the heavy stupor of sleep and alcohol.

Through open doors and windows, the white glory of the moon and the soft breath of the summer night came in.

The silence throbbed with a sudden tumultuous burst of melody. The bird in the rosebush had waked for a moment, or else he had sung in his sleep.

The baby stirred. She rocked him gently.

"I wonder," she whispered, "If I will forget how to think and wish and plan. I wonder if people do forget how to do these things. It is just as well to forget."

And then, as a thousand times before, the music of the night and the radiance of the moon and stars sustained her; like messengers of heaven, they spoke peace and hope to Phœbe's soul.

Without stint or measure, the light of heaven which glorified her sleeping child clothed her husband in its white splendor.

"If God is everywhere, God must be in the moonlight," she whispered. "The flowers out there don't know they're doing any good, but if they should stop blooming and smell so sweet, how I should miss them! And that bird don't know I'm listening to him, but he helps me to live."

The Kindly Heart

WHEN we are well and strong, how poor are we
To lack, or seem to lack, that gentle grace,
That should be writ in manner and in face
In proof of our regard and sympathy:
But, when the hand of sickness on our form
Is sorely laid and some kind, faithful friend
In gracious acts, upon us doth attend,
'Tis then the heart responsive beats and warm
Oh, not alone in our extremity
Of need and helplessness let us bestow
Upon our fellow-men, in verity,
Kind looks, kind words, kind actions, that we owe!
How truly blest the human heart may be,
Then shall we feel; then shall we fully know!

EDEN REEDER LATT

"Surely I Will Be With Thee"

THERE never were words that were sweeter.
There never was promise more dear,
Than this message God gave to His children
Bidding them trust and not fear:
"Surely I will be with thee";
Yes, ever your footsteps I'll guide,
And the storm-clouds shall not hide Me from thee,
For I will be close by thy side.

So often in sickness and trouble
These words have brought sweet peace to me;
I would hear through the gloom and the darkness:
"Surely I will be ever with thee."
"Surely I will be with thee."
Oh, precious these words of cheer!
To know that with love never-failing
Our Lord is always near.

What Will Japan Do In Korea?

he country. The former I deem to be moral impossibility, and the latter ould mean trouble of the severest ind. I have no desire to magnify the angers of the situation; but this uch is certain, that Japan is deter-ined to control every great social ovement in Korea in order to make work for her own interest. It may e that in some measure they do this n the honest belief that this is the ight thing to do; but to the Western-rs who are looking on, the situation anything but reassuring.

I hardly need go into the particulars f Christian advance in that little ountry. They are known the world ver. If the present rate of progress ontinues, the entire nation will not nly be evangelized but will be Chris-ianized within fifteen years. The na-ional scope of the movement cannot e too strongly emphasized. It is a errific moral revolution and one that as significant in the spiritual sphere s the emergence of Japan from her olitude in 1854 was in the political phere. It does not make so much oise, but it is as momentous in its ossibilities. I believe that in two eeks' time I could find a thousand oreans, deeply spiritual Christian en, who would willingly go to China s missionaries of the Cross and at a alary ludicrously small compared ith that which the Western mission-ry absolutely requires. But it is not ime for this yet. The Koreans need ears of education and training. This hey must get at the hand of the mis-ionaries, for Japan has plainly de-lared that she is not going to provide igher education for the Korean peo-le! One of the highest Japanese au-horities said this unequivocally to a riend of mine in Korea.

What Korea needs from America to-ay is not useless sympathy over a lost ause, but genuine helpfulness along he line of education. If Japan is not to give them higher education, we must. When in 1905 we abrogated our treaty of friendship with Korea, and that without warning, it was a severe blow to the good opinion that the Koreans had formerly held of us. We now have an opportunity to give them something that will be better, perhaps, than political autonomy would have been, namely, an enlightened conscience, which will enable them to carry themselves erect and self-respecting in the face of their masters. Korea has no future, except in the moral sphere; but in that sphere she has the possibility and the promise of splendid distinction.

I would like to say to the American public through the columns of this widely read paper that there are some of us who have loved Korea and suffered with her. We have found in her certain qualities which are distinctive and which should be preserved, for the good of the whole Far East. We have felt somethi- · of what our ancestors felt, when they reluctantly took down their muskets and went to war for their liberties in 1776. But there is a higher patriotism than that which depends upon political autonomy, and there are those of us who believe that Korea is destined to do a work which will make her name cherished when the physical conquests of her neighbors have been forgotten.

When in the night I wake and think upon
That land, I see before me Hagar, thrust—
Offending, aye, but uncomplaining—forth
Beyond the pale of human sympathy.
She takes her little children by the hand
And leads them out into a boundless, sere
And cruel desert. But when calumny
And greed have done their worst and, Hagarlike,
She lays her little ones upon the ground
To die, some great Archangel militant,
Beholding in th' averted face of God
The shadow of her mother-agony,
With insubordination unrebuked
Will leap the battlements to bring her help.

And the name of that Archangel is the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

A Terrible Punishment

By Lucy J. Whiting, Oberlin, O.

N times of flood or famine America has ever been China's friend, and HE CHRISTIAN HERALD has more than nce been the medium between the eedy in that land and hearts that ere touched with sympathy in this. his has done more than feed the ungry and clothe the naked; it has een an expression of Christian love hat cannot be misunderstood.

For more than a year after the last amine, the children playing in the treets were labeled "Minneapolis," or after they had eaten the flour sent y THE CHRISTIAN HERALD they wore he sack, and the bags looked as though hey had grown legs!

From Shansi there now comes a athetic tale of extreme poverty lead-ng to law-breaking, and the conse-uent punishment. In the region orth of Fen-Chou-Fu (Shansi), the eople are very poor. When they lanted wheat, the income from their mall farms was not sufficient for the ear's expenses. They knew that if hey planted the poppy, their income ould be greater. They also knew hat it was against the law; but in heir straits, they decided that they ust grow opium. So they banded ogether, thinking that if every one lanted it, the authorities could not do uch in punishing them.

They started planting, and retribu-ion followed quickly. An official with hundred soldiers went to the village nd shot down thirty-nine men, and old the rest he would be back to do he same to them if the poppy were llowed to grow.

This news has come from Rev. Watts). Pye, of the Shansi Mission, and he dds, "It seems an awful punishment; ut it will make the people realize that they must obey the law whatever the cost to themselves."

He made no appeal for help, but can we forget the widows and orphans in their distress? Can we not send food for the winter months and seed for the coming year? Mr. Pye and his faithful helpers would be able to relieve much distress if they had the means, and it would open the hearts of the people to receive the Gospel if he could follow the example of Christ, who had "compassion on the multitude."

* * *

[Rev. C. N. Pond, of Oberlin, Northern Secretary of the Industrial Missionary Association, vouches for the writer of the above. In a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD he says: "I wish to add my testimony to that of Mrs. Lucy J. Whiting. She has long been known to me as a most devoted and useful missionary, as was also her husband, the late Dr. Whiting of the Presbyterian Board. I am personally acquainted, also, with Rev. Watts O. Pye, of the American Board, whom she mentions. Both he and his family are well and widely known as people of high character."]

Could Not Do Without It

I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for about twenty-five years, and could not well do without it now. I feel that I ought as a duty to write and tell you that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as my family religious paper, has pleased, edified, instructed and helped me so very much along the years that it is a necessity now. May God continue to bless and prosper THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

In Remembrance of Him*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

LET us recall the day when Jesus fed with five loaves and two fishes that great multitude of five thousand men, beside women and children. They had come in the early morning from long distances, and had all day listened to his wonderful teachings, and had been blessed by his marvelous works of healing. Jesus' loving heart would not permit him to send them away hungry to their far-away homes, and so he fed them through his word and touch of power; the five loaves and two fishes were enough and to spare.

Let us take that scene for a background for the more wonderful occasion by which the whole world has been fed in soul life. A company that no man can number has been fed from a single loaf of bread, not once, but thousands of times, through nineteen centuries, and are still being fed in the twentieth century, and will be fed through the centuries to come, as long as time shall last. Of course we refer to the occasion of the Last Supper, when Jesus took bread and blessed and broke it, and gave to his disciples and said: "Take, eat; this is my body."

The Supper in the Upper Room

The feeding of the multitude with the five loaves and two fishes was on the grassy plain of Bethsaida. The supper instituted for the world was in an upper room of a house in Jerusalem. It was probably in the house of Mary, the mother of Mark, who wrote the second Gospel. Later, it was in that same room where the disciples of Jesus waited for the descent of the Holy Spirit after Jesus had ascended to heaven. Not having a place of his own it was necessary that Jesus should sometimes ask favors of his friends. At the time of the Passover the disciples asked him: "Where wilt thou that we make ready for thee to eat the Passover?" And he sent Peter and John to find a place. Jesus had in his thought the very place he wanted—the upper room, the room on the roof—in the house of Mary, mother of John Mark. And he directed Peter and John where to find the place. He said: "Go into the city (Jerusalem); there ye shall meet a man bearing a pitcher (jar) of water; follow him into the house where he goeth." To bear water in a jar on the head was peculiarly the work of women. It was an unheard-of thing for a man to be doing it, so that Peter and John easily found their man. Jesus told them the very words they should speak to him: "Where is the quiet chamber, where I shall eat the Passover with my disciples?" And Jesus said: "He will show you a large upper room furnished; there make ready." Mark, afterwards writing about the occasion, says: "And the disciples went forth, and came into the city, and found as he had said unto them; and they made ready the Passover." (Mark 14: 16.) In every house in Jerusalem the Passover supper was being prepared at that time in celebration of the time when the Israelites had passed out from the bondage of Egypt to the land of promise given them by God. The first Passover Supper had been eaten on the night of their going out by the command of God, when he said to Moses and Aaron: "Speak ye unto all the congregation of Israel, saying, In the tenth day of this month they shall take to them every man a lamb, according to their fathers' houses, a lamb for a household; and if the household be too little for a lamb, then shall he and his neighbor next unto his house take one according to the number of the souls. . . . Your lamb shall be without blemish, a male a year old . . . and ye shall keep it until the fourteenth day of the same month; and the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel shall kill it at even. . . . and they shall eat the flesh that night, roast with fire, and unleavened bread [bread without yeast]; with bitter herbs they shall eat it. . . . And thus shall ye eat it: with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and ye shall eat it in haste; it is Jehovah's Passover." (Ex. 12: 3-11.)

Making Ready the Passover

Let us consider what was included in making ready the Passover: The lamb was to be secured and taken to the temple a short time before the hour of the evening sacrifice, usually at about 2.30 P.M.; then it was to be slain, and the fat upon the inwards offered as a sacrifice; then it was to be carried away and roasted; probably the lamb, which Peter and John procured, was roasted in the house of Mary. The bitter herbs, the unleavened bread and the wine were no doubt secured in some market-place. Then the table was made ready. And when the sun was going down, and Peter and John were watching for the coming of their Master, they must have seen him and his other disciples coming over the slopes of Olivet from Bethany. Perhaps Peter and John went out to meet them, but they did not need to be shown the way. After reaching the room, the first thing that occurred was the foot washing; that was necessary because of the wearing of sandals, which covered only the sole of the foot, and were held on by a strap. Usually the washing of feet was done by servants, but it is recorded that Jesus girded himself with a towel and took a ewer of water and a basin and proceeded to wash the feet of his disciples. In so doing he dignified service. "Whosoever would be first among you, shall be your servant." At first Peter withstood Jesus, saying: "Thou shalt never wash my feet." Jesus replied: "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me." And impetuous Peter replied: "Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head." After the washing was done, Jesus impressed lessons of humility and loving service upon his disciples by saying: "If I then, the Lord and the Teacher, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet, for I have given you an example that ye also should do as I have done to you."

An Oriental Supper

Then followed the eating of the paschal supper. Whether they ate as the Israelites did "with loins girded and staff in hand" we cannot say, but we are inclined to think they did, as they might have done as Dr. Henry Clay Trumbull suggested: "For centuries past it has been the Oriental habit at mealtime to group themselves around the very small and low circular table known to-day in America as the tabouret and often seen in the shops of dealers in Eastern wares. On the tabouret stands the single great meat dish in which were the articles of food making up the meal. Each person reclines on the floor, supporting the head on the left elbow, which rests on a pillow on the floor. The bodies of those present at the meal recline outward from the tabouret like the spokes of a wheel from the hub." The pictures of the Last Supper by Da Vinci and other artists give us a very different idea, but let us not forget that their pictures were painted fifteen hundred years after the event, and by artists certainly unfamiliar with Oriental people and customs.

13. Third cup of the fruit of the ne. Jesus used the cup in connection th the Lord's Supper. "This is my od of the New Testament." And s was probably followed by the dis- rse of Jesus recorded in John, chap- s 14 to 17.
14. Second part of the Hallel sung. nd when they had sung a hymn ey went out."

And thus was the paschal supper rged into the Lord's Supper. The wish institution became a Christian e.

The Sin Offering

The death of the lamb in the sin ering represented the death of a bstitute, and that substitute was rist, "the Lamb of God that taketh ay the sin of the world." The an- nt altar of sacrifice reappears in the rd's table. Indeed the altar itself presented a table where God and the rshiper met.

The burnt offering consisted of an tire animal laid alive upon the altar be subsequently slain. The pres- ce of Christ himself at the Supper, eaking of his blood which should be ured out for the remission of sins, lfilled what might be called the prophecy in the lamb laid upon the altar. There is also another point of view expressed by the apostle Paul when he said by way of explaining how fully the Christian should be consecrated to the service of his Lord: "I beseech you by the mercies of God that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice," so that whether "living or dying ye are the Lord's."

The sinner, in the Jewish ritual, having been brought into at-one-ment with God through the sin offering, and having devoted himself to the service of God by the burnt offering, comes to the altar on such intimate terms as to eat with his Lord. The peace offering was divided into three parts: One part to be burnt, which represented God's part in the feast; a second part to be eaten by the priest; and a third part to be taken away to be eaten by the worshiper and his friends at a sacrificial supper. At the Last Supper the disciples ate with their Lord and Master, partaking of the emblems of his broken body and shed blood. And Jesus told them that a day should come when they should again sit down together in heavenly places, in his Father's kingdom. Then fellowship with God on earth means fellowship with him in heaven. Who can measure the joy of that privilege?

Fellowship of the Lord's Supper

How the sweet fellowship that first Lord's Supper must have deepened after Judas had gone out! In loving thought Jesus drew nearer to his disciples, and gave to them the comfort of such words as: "Let not your heart be troubled." "In my Father's house are many mansions. . . . I go to prepare a place for you." "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do." "I will pray the Father and he shall give you another Comforter." "Because I live, ye shall live also." "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you." "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit." "Love one another, even as I have loved you." "No longer do I call you servants, but I have called you friends." "A little while and ye behold me no more; and again a little while, and ye shall see me." "I will pray the Father for you." And then he did pray: "Holy Father, keep them in thy name which thou hast given me, that they may be one, even as we are."

There are several aspects of the Lord's Supper. Sometimes we speak of it as the Sacrament; at other times as the Communion, and again as the Eucharist. These three expressions indicate three views, all in harmony, and all necessary to a full understanding of the Lord's Supper.

How Advertising Benefits

'N this week's CHRISTIAN HERALD you will find an editorial calling attention to the great amount of reading matter which this publication supplies its readers. Three of the leading magazines of the country are contrasted with HE CHRISTIAN HERALD, showing that whereas in September they had on the verage 288 columns containing 125,147 words of reading matter, THE CHRISAN HERALD gave its readers during the month of September 281 columns ntaining 184,212 words.

Not only is this amount of reading matter very much greater than that ven by the leading magazines each month, but it is many times greater in oportion to the amount of advertising matter published by each. In other ords, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives its readers a greater amount of reading atter, in proportion to its advertising, than any leading monthly magazine. n the other hand, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was enabled to give those 184,212 ords of editorial matter because of the revenue derived from the advertising the various issues.

The advertising which appears in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is not only of nefit to the reader in a commercial way, but it is of direct benefit to him in fluencing the publication of a greater amount of editorial matter than would otherwise possible.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE HRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, ho must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the lvertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date the appearance of the advertisement.

WISE WORDS

A Physician on Food.

A physician, of Portland, Oregon, has views about food. He says:

"I have always believed that the duty of the physician does not cease with treating the sick, but that we owe it to humanity to teach them how to protect their health, especially by hygienic and dietetic laws.

"With such a feeling as to my duty I take great pleasure in saying to the public that in my own experience and also from personal observation I have found no food to equal Grape-Nuts, and that I find there is almost no limit to the great benefit this food will bring when used in all cases of sickness and convalescence.

"It is my experience that no physical condition forbids the use of Grape-Nuts. To persons in health there is nothing so nourishing and acceptable to the stomach, especially at breakfast, to start the machinery of the human system on the day's work.

"In cases of indigestion I know that a complete breakfast can be made of Grape-Nuts and cream and I think it is not advisable to overload the stomach at the morning meal. I also know the great value of Grape-Nuts when the stomach is too weak to digest other food.

"This is written after an experience of more than 20 years, treating all manner of chronic and acute diseases, and the letter is written voluntarily on my part without any request for it."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

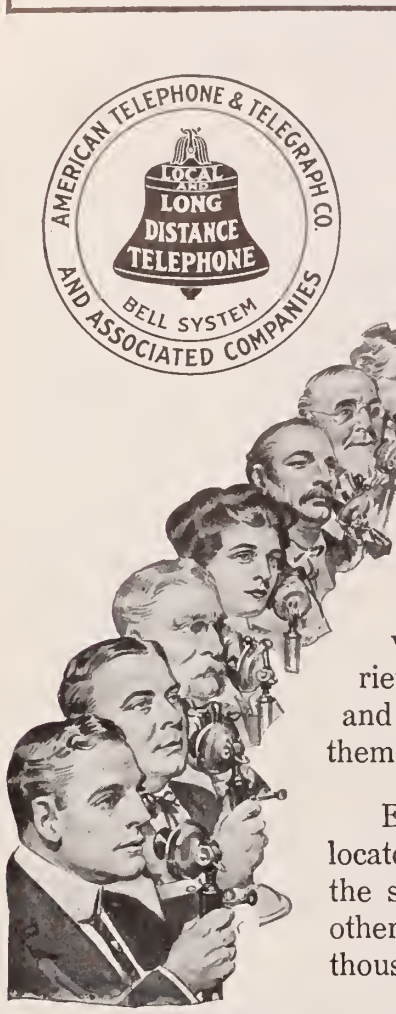
A United Nation



Millions of people touch elbows and are kept in constant personal contact by the Bell System.

There are all kinds of people, but only one kind of telephone service that brings them all together. They have varying needs, an infinite variety, but the same Bell System and the same Bell Telephone fits them all.

Each Bell station, no matter where located, is virtually the center of the system, readily connected with other stations, whether one or a thousand miles away.

Only by such a universal system can a nation be bound together.

MUSIC LESSONS FREE
In Your Own Home

In order to make our home study courses known in your locality we will give you—absolutely free—48 or 96 lessons for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Mandolin, or Cornet. In return we ask that you recommend our Institute to your friends after you learn to play.

It matters not whether you are a beginner or an advanced pupil, the lessons will be made suitable to your need. It is not necessary that you know one note from another. The lessons are so simple and easy that any person or little child who can read English can learn them.

You will receive one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Thousands have learned by mail and you can do the same.

You and your friends should take advantage of this wonderful offer without delay. Write postal card at once. It will mean much to you to get our Free booklet, which gives full information. Our lessons are marvels of simplicity. Photographs and drawings make everything plain.

Don't say you cannot learn music, but send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Write to-day.

Our First Bulgarian Mission

OFTEN has the question been asked: "Which department of the Church should engage our best attention?" The answer is simple and is to be found in the heart of every true parent. Does not the mother know that her own children are by far more important objects of her attention than the children of her neighbors? It is just as plain that the children of America—that is, the present and future citizens—should enjoy the best possible attention not only of the Church but of the State as well. Every true American should not only see the importance of educating and building up the character of the coming Americans, but should also consider it an imperative duty to help elevate the incoming millions from foreign countries who are spreading throughout the entire length and breadth of this land. These masses must be looked after and properly trained before they have taken advantage of the freedom that this country offers them.

Liberty is a blessed thing, but it is a dangerous thing for those who have no early Christian training. I repeat, these throngs must be taken hold of and brought in touch with the good American institutions, otherwise the latter will have a hard time to fight their own battles in saving their own ground upon which they stand to-day.

During the last ten years, southeastern Europe has furnished the greatest number of immigrants. That corner of the world is a world by itself, and as many nationalities as it represents, so many peculiarities and strange habits, and hence, so much greater the task. Thousands of these fifteen or twenty nationalities come every year and very little has been done for them. Just a few "lighthouses" are at the present time shining in the midst of the dark and stormy sea.

The first mission among the Bulgarians, Macedonians and other Slavic people, which, with the help of God, was started three years ago, has done excellent work. Three years ago God called us plainly to go to Granite City and Madison, Ill., where several thousands of these people, whose languages we speak, have congregated. At first we started with personal work, and a month later my husband opened a night school, which was attended by many young men who did not speak a word of English. About two months later we had gathered a little flock of about a dozen and at once started preaching services and Sunday School. Later we began to hold prayer meetings and woman's meetings, and this year we have started children's services on Sunday afternoons, for which we are especially thankful and happy. There are forty of these children enrolled and they represent fifteen nationalities. So far the night school has enrolled three hundred and forty-five pupils, all men that work in the factories.

The preaching has been very well attended in spite of the persecution we have been having. Our audiences have been five or six times larger than the audiences of their own church, which is Greek Catholic, and yet they have built two churches, but we, thanks to the selfishness of Christian people, have none.

During the financial distress we assisted us in saving about 500 people from the horror of starvation, which is the best service the mission ever rendered for these people.

In addition to the night school on Sunday and midweek religious services, we have opened a reading room for these working people, and also Bagranoff is writing some Christian literature in the Bulgarian language which the Presbyterian Board publishes. Then, also, our mission has been the means of finding employment for many. For example, at the time of the industrial standstill, we helped three hundred hungry people to work. Besides, many have needed protection from dishonest employers and from bad people of their own race, taking advantage of their ignorance, prey upon these poor working people. And what to say about those who daily are crippled and often killed in the factories? All these need us and if we only could have the means we could do a great deal more of humane and Christian work. But, alas, we have only willing hands and very little tools. Who will equip us with more tools which the field demands?

A Bright Group Representing Several Nations of Eastern Europe

In closing let me ask you, dear reader, how can any one expect to efficiently do such a tremendous work with all these branches of religious, educational and social nature, without a proper building? Can you imagine a church and Y. M. C. A. packed all in one room? But this is what we have now. Is it not strange the saloonkeepers have commodious buildings for their customers while we are compelled to carry on such a noble and extensive work with such scanty accommodations? How can we have a night school, preaching, Sunday School, reading room, and children's services all in one room, accommodating only one hundred people? We need very badly a building to answer all the above mentioned purposes.

Twelve poor workingmen of our small community pledged $200 for a building and are praying that American Christian friends might aid us to realize this so-much-needed institution.

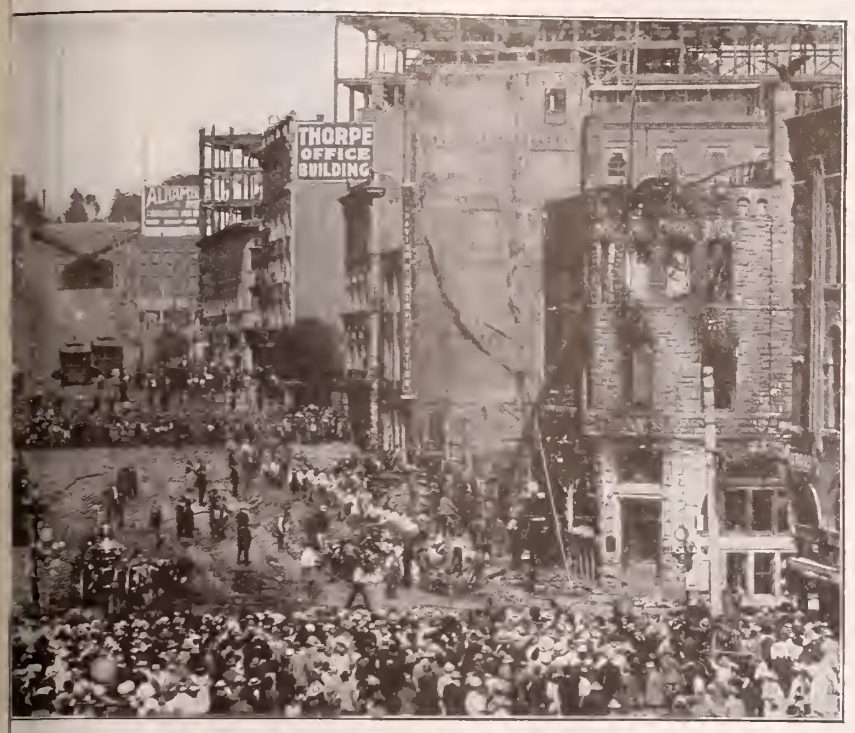
The Los Angeles Explosion



Firemen Extinguishing the Flames After the Explosion in Los Angeles

STATE and local officials are actively engaged in California in an endeavor to discover the perpetrators of the recent explosion in Los Angeles, where the entire plant of the Times was destroyed, and many of the working force were killed. A number of suspects have been arrested, and the authorities seem determined to sift the matter to the bottom. Seldom has Los Angeles been so moved as on the day of the great funeral, when over twenty caskets were gathered before the platform of one of the churches, and the service was conducted by the united clergy of the city. The widows and orphans sat together in the church, and made a pitiful group that stirred the hearts of all.

"The Broom"

HER name was Resi Burgermeister and she was four years old when both her parents died. She had no relations. The Bohemian village authorities did not consider it their duty to care for her. On the contrary they told her to hunt and beg her food and shelter among the farmers.

When she came to a house they looked cross and angrily at her. They sent the poor little one, hungry and tired, to the next house. Then she made the rounds of the village, but no one wanted to care for her. They said she should go elsewhere. But where could the four-year-old orphan go? And when she had called everywhere in vain, she left the village behind and started out into the country.

Soon the poor child was only called "The Broom." But no one who could have cared for her, wished to do so.

At last they remembered that in the town of Dauba, there was a Protestant Orphan Asylum for girls. But Resi was a Catholic. Yet she was welcome, and thus the four-year-old "Broom," whose feet had swept the highway, found a home. Not long ago, fire destroyed one of the buildings of the orphanage. Even the clothing of forty little girl inmates was burned. An effort is now being made to rebuild it. Any reader who is interested in the place where "The Broom" found a refuge, may learn of it by writing to Rev. Dr. Paul de Schweinitz, 20 Church Street, Bethlehem, Pa.

Believe on the Lord

OH Sinner! believe on the Lord—
Believe He is mighty to save.
His love, as revealed in His word,
Is proved by the life which He gave.
Believe, oh believe on the Lord;
And trust in His comforting word.

Perchance you have wandered away
From God, who would have you return.
Come back, oh come back, while you may,
Come back and obedience learn.
Oh wander no more—no more;
Return, and forgiveness implore.

Oh come—and repent of your sins,
God's promise of pardon is sure.
A pardon true penitence wins—
The truth of God's word shall endure.
The penitent soul shall find grace—
True love—and in heaven a place.

Come home then, poor sinner, come home,
Where loved ones are waiting for you.
No more in the wilderness roam,
Henceforth to the Father be true.
Come home to your Father's embrace
Oh turn from your sin and disgrace.

The soul that returns shall find peace,
The burden of sin shall remove.
The joys of salvation increase,
You bask in the sunshine of love.
Safe, safe on the glorified shore,
Your home with the saints evermore.

Young People's Societies

A Call to Self-Examination*

"FROM time to time," said that consecrated poet George Herbert, "tumble up your chest and see what you have there."

The old monks and many of the early fathers of the Church devoted far too much time to self-examination. The salvation of self was their absorbing desire. They shut themselves away from the world and tried to "purify" themselves by fastings and scourgings. In our day we have learned that a man is most surely uplifted by labor for others.

And yet he must sometimes go apart and measure himself and his faith. He must say: "Am I consistent? Do I condemn the faults of others while there is a beam in mine own eye?"

If he is candid with himself he will need all his courage in order to render up his true account to his God and to go forward.

For self-examination usually means reform, and the human heart, like human society, hates reform. The Chinese, whose customs are probably more firmly fixed than those of any other race, have only carried to an extreme this common tendency. In every age and country the acknowledged "reformer" is usually suspected of being a crank, and is more or less ridiculed and discredited.

Custom is easy to follow. Reform is hard. Most of us prefer to move along the lines of least resistance because it is easiest.

And yet Haggai and Paul, and most of all, our Lord Jesus Christ, were great reformers. John Wesley, Whitefield, Finney, were great reformers.

Every earnest Christian should realize that from the moment he takes the vows of God upon him he is pledged, not to a comfortable life of "doing as the rest do," but to deep scrutiny of that life, and to a thorough reconstruction of it in its weak and false parts.

There are no "flowery beds of ease" for him who has undertaken to devote his life to the hastening of the millennial day. It is bound to be a hard fight from start to finish. Satan will not give up his strongholds without a struggle.

But the army cannot conquer unless the individual soldier is strong and true. If tuberculosis and cancers and deadly fevers are working in the systems of the soldiers, the army might as well lay down its weapons at once. It can do nothing.

So if in the soul unbelief and selfishness and impurity are sapping moral fibre, search yourself for the black spot which may show the beginning of one of these destructive diseases of the spirit. Unless you are yourself sound of soul you cannot effectually fight the great fight for the salvation of others.

And the change will generally show. Dr. Banks tells of revisiting a former parish and meeting a man who had in the old days been hard and atheistic, but who had been for some years a follower of Christ. He says: "Instead of the old cynical look on his face, it was a face illuminated, the eyes full of keen and loving interest. I felt that there was a heart which had been touched with the heavenly fire."

No greater beauty can ever come to a human countenance than that which shines from a pure heart, full of the love of the Master.

So grant me, God, from every care
And stain of passion free,
Aloft through virtue's purer air
To hold my course to thee!
No sin to cloud, no lure to stay
My soul, as home she springs;
Thy sunshine on her joyful way,
Thy freedom in her wings.

Secrets of Happiness*

MISS MAUDE SOPER, of Tokyo, tells a story of a Japanese woman who asked a mission teacher if only pretty girls were taken to be educated.

"No," replied the teacher, "we take all girls who come to us."

"But," continued the woman, "all your girls seem to be pretty."

"We teach them soul-culture," explained the teacher.

"Well," said the woman, "I do not want my daughter to become a Christian, but I am going to send her to your school to get that look in her face."

Was there ever more beautiful testimony to the working of the Spirit? Truly the heart which knows its sweet influences lends a heavenly light to the face outside.

"My peace I give unto you," said the Divine One; and it is peace of soul which is the most essential element to happiness.

"The law of the Lord is perfect, restoring the soul," says the Psalmist. Torn and bleeding from the battles of sin, the soul comes under God's law and is made whole and sound.

Much of the disquietude and suffering of our times arises from the periodical conflicts between capital and labor.

Said the Hon. Carroll D. Wright: "In the adoption of the philosophy of the religion of Jesus Christ as a practical creed for the conduct of business lies the surest and speediest solution of our industrial difficulties."

Think of the happiness which would result if all employers and their workers followed consistently the law of God.

We can hardly contemplate the horrors of a world without Christ. Even in so-called Christian countries there are awful crimes; but in the countries which do not know Him, and in the ages before He came, many of these worst crimes were legal and uncondemned by all save an insignificant few.

Roman parents often exposed their new-born infants to wild beasts and birds of prey. The great Seneca wrote: "Weak children we destroy. It is reasonable to thus separate the useless from the sound."

Slavery throughout the ancient world was nearly universal. Human life was cheap and worthless. Beggars were on every side. Dr. Josiah Strong, in his wonderful book, The New Era, reminds us of the shocking fact that in so-called "Christian" England 72,000 thieves and robbers suffered the death penalty during the reign of Henry VIII, when the population was only about one-seventh of what it now is. In a single year 300 beggars were executed for soliciting alms. It seemed as though bloodthirstiness were a passion among the lawmakers, and the slightest misdemeanors, as well as atrocious crimes, were visited with death.

Imagine the misery of those dark days. The leaven of Christian love and pity has seemed to work but slowly down the ages. It is still far from universal, but the blessed day is hastening on when the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord. Then mankind shall be led forth with peace and the mountains shall break forth into singing.

A young missionary just going forth to a distant field, when asked why she went, said: "Because this world has been a different place to me since I found my Saviour, and because his love has fully satisfied my heart, I want to go and show to others who do not know him that which has done so much for me."

The love of Christ maketh rich and addeth no sorrow. It is the source of the true happiness.

Col. Roosevelt an Aeronaut

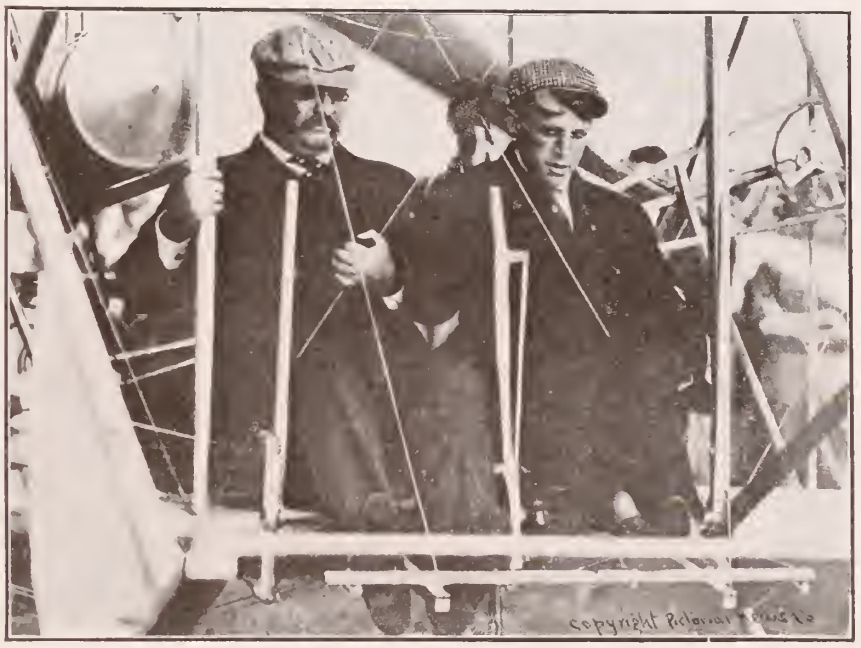
WHEN Colonel Roosevelt was President he astonished the world by going out to a submarine off Oyster Bay and taking a trip beneath the water. He reported that it was an enjoyable experience and showed that his nerves had not suffered from the unusual adventure. During his recent visit to St. Louis he was taken on an aerial trip by Arch Hoxsey, the noted aeronaut, and is thus the first man who has ever sat in the presidential chair to enjoy the new mode of locomotion above the earth as he was the first beneath the water. Colonel Roosevelt had received a number of invitations before to take a sail in a flying machine, but these had been declined. At the recent aviation meet at St. Louis the Colonel motored over to the grounds with Governor Hadley. The Governor was perturbed when the Colonel accepted Mr. Hoxsey's invitation, but he saw he could not dissuade him and remained an interested spectator.

The Colonel pulled off his light fall overcoat and his felt hat and jumped into the seat. He borrowed an old motor cap and was ready, while his friends were still gasping in astonishment over his quick acceptance of the invitation to take a trip aloft.

One of the mechanicians started the motor, while twenty soldiers held the flying machine back until all was ready for the start. Then Mr. Hoxsey gave the signal, the soldiers let go and the machine skimmed along the ground. Then the aeronaut pulled a lever and the big Wright machine shot upward. It sailed off to a distant corner of the aviation field, where it went up to about fifty feet. The machine circled around until it passed by the front of the crowd of spectators. As it passed the Colonel, smiling broadly, waved his hand to the crowd, but they seemed too much surprised to answer. When the planes tilted and the machine came gracefully to earth the crowd broke into a thundering cheer that could be heard far beyond the aviation grounds. The people rushed forward to greet the Colonel and the National Guards had all they could do to keep him from being carried off. Colonel Roosevelt grasped the aviator's hand vigorously.

"It was great," he exclaimed. "I only wish I could have stayed up an hour! It was fine," said the Colonel, and as he hurried back to his automobile he could be heard exclaiming over the delights of the trip. "That was a fine ride," said he as the motor sped away just twenty minues after it had entered the grounds.

The Colonel was up just three minutes and twenty seconds. As he rode back to the city he was accompanied by several machines which acted as a guard of honor.



Colonel Roosevelt and Mr. Hoxsey Ready to Start

His Philosophy

IT is well known that but few people, when called upon, are prepared to repeat the text or give an outline of the sermon they have just heard. But an Irishman seldom lacks for a reply or excuse when taken to task, even though he may not fully comprehend what is required of him. The following dialogue between a farmer and his hired man furnishes a beautiful example of this truth together with a striking climax:

"That was a good sermon, was it not, that we heard last Sunday?" said the farmer.

"True for you, yer honor, an illigant one! It done me a power of good intirely. Indade it did."

"I'm glad of that. Can you tell me what interested you most? What was it about?"

"Oh, well," scratching his head; "I don't rightly—not just exactly know. I—a—I——. A'where's the use in telling? Sure I don't remember one single 'dividual word of it, good or bad. Sorra a bit of me knows."

"And yet you say that it did you a power of good?"

"So it did, sir. I'll stick to that, yer honor."

"I don't see how."

"Well, now, yer honor, look here. There is my shirt after the wife's washing; and clean and white it is, by reason of all the water and the soap and the starch that's gone through it. Do you see? But not a drop of 'em all—water, or soap, or starch, or blue—has stayed in, d'ye see? And that's just the same wid me and that sermon! It's run through me, yer honor, and it's dried out of me; but all the same, just like me Sunday shirt, I'm the cleaner and the better after it."

There was more sound philosophy than the farmer was aware of in the quaint reasoning of Pat. So it happens that impressions for good or evil may be indelibly stamped upon the mind and bear fruit, long after the cause which produced them has passed away or is forgotten.

THE BOY AND HIS BOOKS

This is a Good Combination Provided the Boy is Properly Nourished With Wholesome, Digestible Foods

This is the time of the year when the school problems are uppermost in the minds of the average parents. Whether Johnny takes kindly to his books or not will largely depend on his mental and physical condition. If his body is properly nourished and he is full of bounding vigor and bouyant spirits he is apt to take to study and play with more alacrity and enthusiasm. The poorly nourished boy is the boy that does not like his studies. School is a bugbear to him. All the talk you can give him will not arouse his enthusiasm. He has no appetite for Latin verbs or Greek roots.

Unfortunately there are some parents who cling to the old ideas that you can build boys out of books and sermons. Mental vigor goes hand in hand with physical robustness. The hungriest boy on earth is the growing boy at ten. His body demands building material that will make good bone, brain and muscle. Not all the neglected children are in the slums. Some of the children from the homes of the well-to-do are starving for nourishing, wholesome, body-building food.

Children who are in school should not be fed on heavy meats or starchy foods. They clog the brain and retard digestion. A Shredded Wheat Biscuit heated in the oven until crisp and then eaten with hot milk and a little cream will supply all the strength a boy or girl needs for study or play, and will keep the stomach and bowls in healthy, active condition. Being ready-cooked and ready-to-serve it is so easy to quickly prepare a warm, nourishing meal for the school children on wintry mornings when they are in a rush to get away to school. The crisp shreds compel thorough mastication, which means sound teeth and good digestion. A little fruit, of course, adds very much to the wholesomeness and nutritive value of the Biscuit. A Biscuit eaten with hot milk and fruit every morning for breakfast will not only supply all the strength and vigor needed but will fortify them against the diseases that are common to them in cold weather. Nearly every grocer sells it.

THE FIRE-SWEPT BORDER

HARDLY had the forest fires in Idaho finished their destructive work when the news was flashed over the wires that the Rainy River district in Minnesota was being burned over and that just north of the Canada line hundreds had lost their lives. A large number of people managed to escape to Warroad, Minn. Hotels and private dwellings were thrown open to accommodate them and the entire population seemed engaged in relief work. Relief trains were sent out, in some cases through flaming woods, to carry relief and bring back settlers who were in exposed districts. One train was sent out to Salol on the Great Northern Railroad and brought back two hundred panic-stricken refugees. Women carrying their children had fled six and seven miles through the dense smoke to reach the railway. As the train came back with its burden of precious lives, it ran part of the distance over burning ties. In places wild animals fled side by side with human beings to escape the on-rushing billow of flame, which passed over some stretches of forest as if they were but grass.

One engineer, after a run through part of the fire-stricken region, said as he swung from his scorched cab: "If the fire keeps on that way there will be little left of the population in that part of Minnesota."

Some settlers escaped by wading into Rapid River though their faces were blistered by the intense heat. Fire wardens in that neighborhood fought a desperate battle with the flames. It is said that practically all the live stock has perished.

From Winnipeg, Manitoba, came the report that over five thousand people were homeless along the Canadian border, and that at least five hundred were dead. The town of Pio in Ontaria was swept by the flames and seventeen dead were left amid the ruins.

Beaudette and Spooner were also burned. When it was seen that the places were doomed a train of fifty-three box cars was made up and the people taken to Rainy River. Later that place was partly in flames. The fires have been burning in the vicinity of Rainy River since last July, but recently they developed a sudden fury and burned with a rapidity which nothing could check. The heat was so intense that people were overcome, and dropped in the streets. In some di[c]tions the woods were one sheet of fl[ie] for a mile and a half at a stre[h]. People got on the river steamers [nd] many fled on Canadian trains w[re] they could reach them. Many sett[rs] crazed with grief are roaming [ie] woods, and relief parties are b[ig] sent out at this writing to bring in [ie] injured and dead and save the [e-] mented from penetrating into the [ill] burning woods. The Great Paris Strik[e]

PARIS for some time past has [en] in the throes of a gigantic [il]road strike. Transportation to [nd] from the city was tied up on Oc[ber] 10 and for days thereafter. Fre[ht,] mail and passenger business was [a] standstill and there was a strong [ob]ability of a food famine. Over 8[00] working people were unable to [ch] their places of employment, thr[gh] lack of transportation. Outside [he] city itself, there were many inst[ces] of violence along the lines of rail[ys.] Passenger and freight trains [ere] stopped, cars were derailed, live-[ock] cargoes were liberated, telegraph [nd] telephone lines were cut, and obs[uc]tions were placed on almost [ery] track leading to Paris.

This singular strike originated [ith] the railroad employees, who de[nd] higher wages, a better divisio[n] of labor, one day weekly off duty, [nd] employment by the month inste[d] of by the day. It began with the [em]ployees of the Western Railroad [nd] it was expected that a large ma[jor]ity of the men on the Eastern Rail[ad,] the Paris, Lyons and Mediterra[an] road, and the Paris-Orleans [oad] would join the strike, which [ould] have made the tie-up absolute wh[ile] it lasted. This, however, they fail[ed] to do, and the government having [ar]rested nearly 100 of the prom[i]nent strike leaders, the whole movemen[t] has sustained a setback. There are [ow] hopes that it may soon be ended.

The employees of the Paris sub[ways] voted to join the strike, but after[wards] declined and remained at their [posts.] The electricians, however, struck, [and] a great part of the city remained [un]lighted at night, while thousan[ds] of electric cars were stranded for la[ck] of power. It was only by quick [and] energetic work that the author[ities] made it possible for the city to [get] a food supply while the strike was [at] its height. It is worth noting tha[t the] press of Paris supports the view [of] the government in condemning the [strike] as criminal, and planned for the [crip]pling of the public service an[d the] paralysis of trade.

A LIVING FROM POULTRY

$1,500.00 from 60 hens in ten months on a city lot forty ft. square.

To the average poultryman that would seem impossible, and when we tell you that we have actually done a $1,500 poultry business with 60 hens on a corner in the city garden, 40 feet wide by 40 feet long, we are simply stating facts. It would not be possible to get such returns by any one of the systems of poultry keeping recommended and practiced by the American people, still it can be accomplished by

The Philo System is Unlike All Other Ways of Keeping Poultry and in many respects just the reverse, accomplishing things in poultry work that have always been considered impossible, and getting unheard-of results that are hard to believe without seeing.

The New System Covers All Branches of the Work Necessary for Success from selecting the breeders to marketing the product. It tells how to get eggs that will hatch, how to hatch nearly every egg and how to raise nearly all the chicks hatched. It gives complete plans in detail how to make everything necessary to run the business and at less than half the cost required to handle the poultry business in any other manner.

Two-Pound Broilers in Eight Weeks are raised in a space of less than a square foot to the broiler, and the broilers are of the very best quality bringing here, 5 cents a pound above the highest market price.

Our Six-months-old Pullets Are Laying at the Rate of 24 Eggs Each per Month in a space of two square feet for each bird. No green cut bone of any description is fed, and the food used is inexpensive as compared with food others are using.

Our new book, THE PHILO SYSTEM OF POULTRY KEEPING, gives full particulars regarding these wonderful discoveries, with simple, easy-to-understand directions that are right to the point, and 15 pages of illustrations showing all branches of the work from start to finish.

Don't Let the Chicks Die in the Shell

One of the secrets of success is to save all the chickens that are fully developed at hatching time, whether they can crack the shell or not. It is a simple trick and believed to be the secret of the ancient Egyptians and Chinese which enabled them to sell the chicks at 10 cents a dozen.

Chicken Feed at 15 Cents a Bushel

Our book tells how to make the best green food with but little trouble and have a good supply any day in the year, winter or summer. It is just as impossible to get a large egg yield without green food as it is to keep a cow without hay or fodder.

Our New Brooder Saves Two Cents on Each Chicken

No lamps required. No danger of chilling, over-heating or burning up the chickens as with brooders using lamps or any kind of fire. They also keep all the lice off the chickens automatically or kill any that may be on them when placed in the brooder. Our book gives full plans and the right to make and use them. One can easily be made in an hour at a cost of 25 to 50 cents.

Chats With Young Folks

Getting the Cows

WHO of us with a country bringing-up did not enjoy getting the cows? However much we shirked the wood-pile—and what child is not discouraged to have the wood-box so soon empty?—we ran joyfully to get the cows.

The narrow lane leading to "the pasture bars that clattered as they fell," and the little drove of cows, each with her own characteristics, are familiar to us all. There was always one cow that "bossed" the herd, and wo to the one who so far transgressed as to attempt to enter the barn before her. There were the one who liked to stray to the remotest corner of the pasture and was consequently belled; the cow with a crumpled horn that gave her a sinister look, though in reality she was inoffensive; the mild-eyed Jersey whose milk was mostly cream; the dilatory cow that reached under fences for better feed; the little black-and-white heifer; and the yearling that was being raised because her mother was such a good cow.

Even when they were waiting at the bars, it sometimes took us from four o'clock until dusk to drive them home—there was so much to see. Down the hill we raced, with bare brown feet that often trod on a thistle or low juniper, or soft woolly mullein; through sweet fern and hardhack, dwarf pines and barberries, unheedingly stepping on the countless dainty little bluets and mouse-ear everlasting. On this hill the tiny sweet strawberries were the first to ripen and were eagerly gathered. At the foot of the hill was a most entrancing brook, where we pulled sweet-flag, caught tadpoles, and acquired bloodsuckers, daring each other to see who would get the most on feet and ankles.

The lowlands were blue with iris that we knew as blue-flag, and pink with rhodora. Cotton-grass abounded, much prized for winter bouquets. Little speedwells were there, and long-stemmed blue violets and low sweet white ones, rare arethusa, sweet pogonia and calopogon—but we did not know their names then, nor even that they were orchids. Marsh marigolds blazoned, and later the brook glowed with brilliant cardinal flower, with a white setting of arrowhead and water parsnip, all dear to our childish hearts. Thoroughworts, white and purple, swamp milkweed, monkey-flower and all the host of flowers that follow the brook's highway, were there. Redwings flashed in the reeds and sang "konk-a-ree," or scolded when their nests were approached.

The young checkerberries, pungent in taste and odor, were freely gathered, ground-nuts were dug, and at the right season a young pine was sacrificed for the succulent inner bark, peeled and eaten as "slivers."

In their season red raspberries and blueberries gained their share of attention. Decorated with "evergreen," as we called the ground-pine of various sorts, we skipped over the pine needles, surprising an occasional rabbit, many scolding chipmunks and red squirrels, occasional plump gray ones, and, rarely, a fox.

We startled partridges from their nests, or came upon their broods of little ones that instantly disappeared in the leaves.

Chickadees announced themselves, catbirds mewed from the thickest tangles, chewinks scratched among the leaves, the woodthrushes and hermits sang their ineffably pure, serene, lofty hymns; veeries we heard, but rarely saw, as they chanted their weird, mysterious songs. The world of warblers was then unknown to us. Fear never entered our minds, no matter how dense the woods, for did not brother John have a "bow an' arrer," with which he essayed to shoot partridges and the traditional bear, supposed to inhabit the neighborhood?

We knew as many woodland secrets as the "barefoot boy," and where the hawks and crows nested in the tops of tall trees, with so many dead limbs as to imperil the youthful climber. We found many small nests, but not the hermit thrush's, and not one nest was the worse for our knowledge.

We gathered the blueberries of Clintonia, the shining leaves of prince's pine, known as "pyroly," a leaf of which, faithfully chewed daily, was said to render one proof against consumption. The green and white leaves of rattlesnake plantain delighted us. In vain we asked the name of the little dalibardia that carpeted the woods with its starry white flowers and violetlike leaves. We startled the woodcock and looked with interest at the holes he had prodded in the earth with his long bill.

Partridges whirred out of the young pines, or left the apples unfinished under the natural fruit trees. Lady's slippers, white and pink, late anemones, gold-thread with glossy three-parted leaves, and bitter orange roots, pitcher plant and sundew we gathered, and ghostly Indian pipes.

On warm June nights when the whole earth teemed with fragrance, we hunted for truant cows, past tiny sweet twin-flowers, gorgeous red and yellow mushrooms, into dewy dells and dingles of ferns and sweet smelling things till the fastness of the wanderer was discovered, with perhaps a newly-born calf to be coaxed home. Often the whip-poor-will would call mournfully before we reached the barn.

Usually the cows would make their way leisurely down the hill, which was warm beneath our feet, where the vesper-sparrows sang and nested on the ground, sometimes unprotected by a bush.

Often father would call anxiously, when we were too far behind the cows; and we hurried up the lane with the song of the thrushes from the woods and the nearer song of the vesper-sparrows, sweet and simple, and the inarticulate voice of the night all about us, little realizing how much the memory of these would mean years hence.

The very odor of sweet fern and bayberry, fragrant Dicksonia, the hay-scented fern, odorous grapevines and raspberry bushes, sets one back in a New England pasture; and where else do the hardhack and juniper, mullein and pasture and thistle grow in the same way?

Later, when one is older, and has awakened to the wonders of bird life, to quote Burroughs, "there is a fascination about it quite overpowering. . . . One may go blackberrying and make some rare discovery; or while driving his cow to pasture, hear a new song or make a new observation. Secrets lurk on all sides. There is news in every bush. What a new interest the woods have! How you long to explore every nook and corner of them!

"The woods of our youth may disappear, but the thrushes will always sing for us, and their voices, endeared by cherished associations, arouse echoes of a hundred songs and awaken memories before which the years will vanish."

Chapman says:

There is one spot for which my soul will yearn.
May it but come where breeze and sunlight play,
And leaves are glad, some path of swift return.
A waif—a presence borne on friendly ray—
Even thus, if but beneath the same blue sky!
The grazing kine not then will see me cross
The pasture slope; the swallows will not shy,
Nor brooding thrush; blithe bees the flowers will toss;
Not the faint thistledown my breath may charm.
Ah, me! But I shall find the dear ways old,
If I have leave, that sheltered valley farm:
Its climbing woods, its spring, the meadows gold,
The creek-path, dearest to my boyhood's feet.
O God! is there another world so sweet?

MYRON BENTON.

Six Golden Rules

For Keeping Your Baby Well

This splendid boy is a typical Nestle Baby—Strong boned—ruddy with health—he hardly knows what sickness means.

1. Let baby sleep in his own bed.
2. Bathe baby daily in tepid water.
3. Keep baby outdoors at least two hours every pleasant day.
4. Feed baby at regular hours.
5. Give baby a little cool boiled water twice a day.
6. And most important—be sure the baby's getting the right food, because the stomach and intestines are the most delicate organs.

Nestlé's Food

The Right Food If you're giving the baby NESTLÉ'S FOOD then you can be sure that the food is right, for NESTLÉ'S FOOD builds bone and muscle, and makes healthy blood. For over forty years mothers and doctors have relied on NESTLÉ'S FOOD and have never found it wanting, because NESTLÉ'S is based on a scientific idea, that is nevertheless the simplest in the world. Plain cow's milk isn't good for the baby, say the doctors, and the chemists and the Boards of Health.

The Danger in Cow's Milk Cow's milk forms into large indigestible curds; has too little sugar; is loaded with germs which produce digestive troubles, and all too frequently much graver diseases. But cow's milk has parts that are good, and if you were a chemist and a doctor and owned a chemical laboratory, and had lots of time, you might change cow's milk so that it would agree with your baby. Yet many people, with all these at command, have tried to make cow's milk resemble mother's milk and failed.

A Book which every mother should have

The Nearest to Mother's Milk Henri Nestlé succeeded, as two generations of mothers and doctors testify. He has made the nearest thing in the world to mother's milk. NESTLÉ'S MILK is rich cow's milk, purified, modified and reduced to a powder. And it requires only the addition of water to make it ready for the baby. NESTLÉ'S FOOD is best for the baby, because it is easily digested by the most delicate stomach; thoroughly nourishes; soothes inflamed membrane; gives healthy sleep and makes rosy, dimpled cheeks. Then, too, it is so easily and quickly prepared.

But, NESTLÉ'S FOOD speaks best for itself—so send for a free large trial package.
At the same time, we will send you free our book for mothers, written by specialists, "Infant Feeding and Hygiene."

More About Mortgages

AS we stated in our last financial article, most of the world's business is done on credit. We might have added that most of this credit money is secured by some form of mortgage. Let us look further into this subject of mortgages, examining first the matter of interest.

Suppose you are a mortgagee, that is, the person who lends money on a mortgage, and you are asked to renew. Having satisfied yourself as to the condition of the security, and decided to continue your money in this form of loan and with the same party, the question at once comes up as to the rate of interest.

Business is business, and the man who does not avail himself of its opportunities had better not have anything to do with it. If money is "tight" when the mortgage which you hold comes due, and you can get an equally safe investment at a higher rate than the mortgagor was paying you, why should you renew at the old rate? Mark you, we are now discussing everyday business, not charity or any form of philanthropy; such things are not to be lost sight of, but they are in a class by themselves. Always sell your goods at the highest market price, whether the goods be labor, produce, or money.

On the other hand, suppose you are the borrower and that the money was originally borrowed at a time when there was what is known as "a stringent market." In such a case, you would have paid the rate demanded by the condition of the money market at that time. Now you want to renew the mortgage, and money, it may be, is cheaper, and as a business man you avail yourself of the market conditions, and very properly demand a lower rate. If the lender does not accept, you may go to another customer with money to sell.

Therein is what may be regarded as the speculative side of the mortgage as distinguished from the more staple bond. The condition of the money market may force the lender to accept a low rate to-day, when if he had waited for a month or two he might have added another half of one per cent. to this source of income.

The Value of Property

If you are loaning directly to the borrower, or doing it through an agent, as in the case of a company, one of the first things to consider is the amount of the loan as compared with the assessed or selling value of the property, if it should be forced to auction.

If the loan is made on unimproved land, the record of its yearly increase, or, it may be, decrease in assessments may give a good clue to its present value.

While the assessed value of realty is always less than what it would sell for at forced sale (sometimes it is less by a third or even a half), yet it is never wise to take a mortgage on it for its assessed value, nor for more than two-thirds of its value if forced to auction.

The same rule will hold good as to houses; indeed, it is not always wise to go as high as two-thirds on what is known as "improved property."

The usual method of estimating the value of improved property—on which a mortgage is desired—is to ascertain the amount of its annual rental. As a rule—and we must have rules—this may be all very well, and then again it may not.

Out West, in the old days, there was a trick known as "salting." A man spent a lot of time and nearly all his money in digging a shaft, or running a tunnel in a ledge that was thought to promise gold. No gold appeared, but the investing tenderfoot from the East did, and for him the miner or miners sowed gold nuggets or dust in the drift, and it was there when the time came to "sell to the suckers."

In about the same way some men, who want to raise a stiff mortgage on a poor property, arrange with their confederates, months in advance, to take the property on a "fake" lease, for which a false rent is paid, though all may appear correct on the records.

Other Considerations

There is a class of unscrupulous men, who make a specialty of building cheap flats, usually plastered with mechanics' liens on top of a stiff first mortgage, and then start out to secure a second mortgage.

Now, a second mortgage may be quite as safe as a first, but everything depends on the character of the property, and such property as we are considering is generally valued according to its renting capacity.

The nominal owners of such flat buildings have been known to offer their flats free for several months to irresponsible tenants in the following way: "You can have these flats for two or three or four months free," they will say, "but the last or fifth month must be at the rate of $50 a month. I'll receipt for all the payments, if you pay that one month."

Such an offer is eagerly accepted and the man with his leases goes out to raise a second mortgage on the strength of the property's earnings, and too often he succeeds.

If you are going to loan on a mortgage, it is not only necessary that you satisfy yourself as to the property offered as security, but that you be reasonably sure of your man.

Is the man married or is he single?

The dower right of a wife, being a provision of law, is not a thing to be overlooked in the drawing of a mortgage.

It has often happened that the mortgagor claimed to be single when he had a wife. Later when the mortgage was foreclosed and the property sold, the wife put in an appearance and complicated matters by claiming her dower right. This right varies with different States, but in most it is one-third.

Where the loan is made in one's neighborhood, some of the dangers, just referred to, are avoided by a complete knowledge of the situation. But the investor, when he has his money ready, cannot always find an opportunity for investment among his acquaintances. In most of the mortgage transactions in our large cities, and this is particularly the case where the loan is made through a reputable agent, the property is but seldom seen by the mortgagee and he may never come face to face with the mortgagor.

"Lolling About in Zion"

REV. PRINCIPAL JOWETT of England has a faculty of making strong and picturesque phrases. "Lolling about in Zion" is one of the latest. He employs it to describe those people who, being Christians in name and not in deed and life, offer God ritual and formalism instead of worship and service. They enjoy the good things of this world to the full, calling them blessings, but yielding nothing in return. They prefer a rich sensationalism to a healthy life. Their tastes, their pleasures, their feasts are impressively sensuous. "They live in a perfect whirl of sensations. They pass their days in the channels and passages of living, they abide in the outer halls. They are always on the way, and never arrive. They appear to live, but are not alive. Sensationally they exist, but sympathetically they are dead." In a word they "loll about in Zion," worthless and unprofitable cumberers.

ON THE WORLD'S TOP SHELF

THE Methodists claim to have the mission farthest south in the world, maintaining for years a mission in Punta Arenas, Straits of Magellan, and now comes a letter from District Superintendent Gerhard J. Schilling, who is evangelizing upon one of the "top shelves" of the globe—Bolivia. A missionary of seventeen years' experience, he is opening up new stations in the interior of Bolivia, tending at the same time to an Eng-h, a German and a Spanish church La Paz, the capital of the republic. e says in part:

A Yungas Indian

"I send you to-day a picture of a

Wire Bridge Over the Tamampaya River

ngas Indian, taken recently on one my lonely trips through the mountns of the north. Along the steep pes these natives cultivate coca, fee and cacao. These people are exmely ignorant. A man came to the wn of Coroico to sell five baskets of cao at six dollars each. Said the yer, "I take them. Six times five lars are thirty dollars," and forthh he intended to pay him. But the ian did not agree with him as to result of five times six. He thought ought to be more. So—and this was to me a lesson in patience—the obliging merchant took grains of corn and made six heaps of five grains each. Then he put two heaps together and the Indian agreed as to the sum of ten. Having repeated the operation three times, the surprised vendor acknowledged the sum total to be three times ten, even thirty. This manifest proof of the merchant's honesty made the Indian buy some articles from him in return. As long as the things he bought cost an even amount of dollars all went well; for with every dollar purchase, one grain of corn disappeared from the pile of thirty. But once it was a matter of forty cents. The clever merchant took a grain of corn and changed it into ten grains of wheat. He soon deducted four of them to account for the forty cents, and in a similar manner, a grain of wheat was divided into two of rice to make a nickel purchase possible. And at the end of it all the merchant handed the Indian a dollar for each grain of corn left, a dime for every wheat kernel and a nickel for every grain of rice still on the counter.

"If the apostle Paul needed grace and patience in his dealing with the philosophic Athenians, what do we need in preaching to the Yungas Indian of the twentieth century? There is as much difference between an Ocean Grove camp-meeting audience and an Indian congregation, as there is between the East River Bridge and the 'maroma' over the Tamampaya River, shown in the photograph."

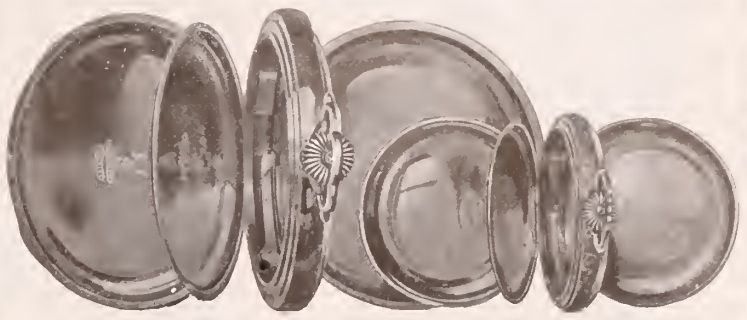
Attacking the Bible

THE latest development in the opposition to the Word of God occurred i the Episcopal Convention in Cincnati, a few days ago. Rev. Dr. Mlvaine of Pittsburg, one of the most scolarly men in the Protestant Episcal denomination (who went into tt body from the Presbyterian Crch, where he held a very promint place in connection with Dr. Hry Van Dyke as associate pastor o the Brick Church), was pleading f the attachment of a preamble, pred by the late Dr. Huntington of Nw York, to the church constitution. D McIlvaine pleaded that the ordiny readers of the church constitu-n would not know whether it was a Cristian, Mormon or Buddhist church. Te word "God" appears in quotation mks, and the word "Christ" is not fnd at all.

This called out the following reply fm Rev. A. A. Morrison of Portland, O.:

"The Scriptures are so full of inaccuracies that the adoption of the proposed preamble would place us in such a position in the scholastic world that it would be impossible to induce men of education to enter the ministry and subscribe to our doctrine. Such an assertion in the preamble would be out of accord with this age of scholarship, because it is impossible to maintain, at this advanced day, that the Bible is the Word of God.

We seem to have reached a point where the statements of sound, scholarly men count for little or nothing, even in church conventions and other assemblies. Everything confirms the conclusion that a crisis is approaching in the widespread attempts to discredit the Bible in our colleges and higher educational institutions. To meet this growing tendency toward infidelity and agnosticism, the Bible League of North America is devoting itself to a special effort to spread among all classes throughout the country correct views on Bible teaching and interpretation. It is meeting with remarkable success and its literature is finding its way into many hands where it is being used to good advantage in meeting the attacks of infidelity and in upholding the standard of the old Gospel of Jesus Christ. Christian men and women everywhere who are interested in the great campaign for Bible Defense should write to the Bible League, Bible House, New York, for its list of publications, which are the productions of the ablest and soundest theologians of our day and which constitute the best weapons for meeting such arguments as that of the higher critic who flung down the gauntlet to Rev. Dr. McIlvaine in the Episcopal Convention.



Your Money's Worth in a Watch Case

The reliable watch case, with its tight-fitting caps and neat joints, is a mighty fine piece of workmanship. There are a dozen ways to cheapen it—in amount of labor put on it, in skill, in weight, in fineness.

The genuine watch case is made not merely to please the eye and to sell, but to protect the wonderfully fine and delicate mechanism of the watch movement or "works."

You know how it is in buying anything: if you take things for granted and don't know what to ask for you get an adulterated article—a substitute said to be "just as good" as the genuine.

The trade marks illustrated on this page are your safeguard. They are standard with the fine jewelry trade, and have been for 50 years. They mean absolute integrity in bullion value, in assay, in construction of a watch case. Be sure to find them. Every good jeweler in this country knows the marks and carries the cases. They are made for ladies' and men's watches—plain, engine-turned, engraved or enameled. All sizes, all patterns.

GIRLHOOD AND Scott's Emulsion

are linked together. The reason is that at a period when a girl's digestion is weak provides her with powerful nourishment in easily digested form.

Scott's Emulsion

It's the food that builds and keeps up a girl's strength.

In 1908, on a small egg-farm, 1953 hens made for the owners a clear profit of $6.41 each

$6.41 multiplied by 1953 makes—what? Over

$12,000 a Year!

Read the story below.

IN 1905 two men named Corning, father and son, were trying to find a paying business for men in poor health and with small capital. Although they had no experience in that line, they decided to raise eggs. They took a few acres at Bound Brook, N. J., and began with only thirty hens. Last year these men had 1953 hens, and made a clear profit of over twelve thousand dollars. This year they have over 4,000 hens. Will they make twice $12,000?

The Corning Egg-Book

(entitled "$6.41 PER HEN PER YEAR") tells the whole story of that little egg-farm, and just HOW the Cornings made their splendid success. It is deeply interesting to every one who wants a safe, paying business, that can be built up with little capital and without years of training. There is a strong demand in all cities for "near-by, selected fancy eggs," and those who can furnish an unfailing supply, winter and summer, get very high prices. This the Cornings learned to do, and the Corning Egg-Book describes their methods, as tested and proved by experience.

Eleventh Edition Now Ready---Revised and Up-to-Date

The book tells where they find their market, how to keep hens laying regularly in winter, when to hatch chicks that are to do their best work in December and January; how to mix the feed that produces the most eggs; how to prevent losses, etc. It tells why they fixed on a certain breed as the best for producing eggs, and how their whole system works to that end. It gives photographic pictures of their plant, and plans of their buildings, which can be built in sections, large or small, as needed. The Corning Egg-Book is sold in combination with the Farm Journal, Philadelphia, Pa.

FARM JOURNAL has for thirty-three years conducted a poultry department known the country over for the ability of its editors and the value of its contents. All its other departments are ably conducted and widely quoted. It is the standard monthly farm and home paper of the country, with already more than 750,000 subscribers. It is clean, bright, intensely practical; boiled down; cream, not skim milk. It is illustrated and well printed on good paper. It has not a medical or trashy advertisement in it.

AMERICAN POULTRY ADVOCATE, the great New York State paper published at Syracuse, and full of good reading matter, is always welcomed by the subscriber. Now in its 18th year. It is conceded to be one of the best poultry papers published in the United States. Well edited by recognized authorities on the subject of practical poultry raising. Has a circulation of 45,000 copies per month.

Special Offer: For $1.00 (cash, money order or check) we will send postpaid the Corning Egg-Book and the Farm Journal for two years, and American Poultry Advocate two years, all for $1.00 if order is sent at once to

EVER I NEED THEE

JESUS, Lord of glory,
Lord of truth and might,
Lord of love unbounded,
Guide my feet aright.
Much I need Thee, Saviour;
Comfort me and bless;
Give me sense of nearness,
And Thy tenderness.

When the shadows darken,
Till I cannot see,
Let my heart say, trusting,
"Thou my Light shalt be."
When deep sorrows gather,
When earth-cares annoy,
Let me say with smiling,
"Thou art all my joy."

If my dearest earth-friend
Proves a broken reed,
Let me know Thy friendship
Will be all I need.
Give me truest comfort,
Hope and strength restore;
Let me love Thee, Saviour,
Ever more and more.

Haddonfield, N. J. MRS. FRANK A. BREC

The Youngstown Revival

THE experience of the people of Youngstown, O., where Evangelist W. A. Sunday last winter conducted a six weeks' campaign, seems to improve the oft-repeated assertion that a period of religious awakening is apt to be followed by a reaction. As a result of the movement referred to, nearly six thousand people professed conversion. A large percentage were men in the prime of life and many of these at once became ardent propagandists of the faith. A Personal Workers' League was organized, and as a result of its activities hundreds were brought to a knowledge of the truth. It has been demonstrated to a certainty that rebellious attitudes of men, when approached in a manly way, stand ready seriously to consider the claims of religion.

Mr. Sunday's work touched every class of people. The great masses of men who, in one way or another, depend directly upon the iron and steel business for a livelihood, were profoundly moved. Of this class the League is for the most part composed. The educational and other learned professions are also represented.

Mr. Sunday's work in Youngstown was concluded late in February, but the activities of the League show no abatement, but constant augmentation. Sabbath afternoon and week night meetings are regularly held. Numerous conversions occur at each of these sessions. The Y. M. C. A. building can no longer contain the crowds demanding entrance. An auditorium is being planned for and theatre meetings will be held during the mid season. All of these services are conducted by recently converted men, many of whom were formerly the slaves of habit. To hear these men tell what God has done for them is the experience of a lifetime.

But the circumstance which justifies the claim that this movement is one altogether unique remains yet to be detailed. The League, for a period of seven months, has been conducting evangelistic meetings in surrounding cities, towns and villages with unprecedented success. Up to date, through its instrumentality, about five hundred persons have been brought into the church. The ideal appears to have been reached of an active and aggressive evangelism conducted by the laity. Youngstown is an iron and steel manufacturing city situated about midway between Pittsburg and Cleveland. JOHN J. THOMA

A Great Mission's Work

From the New York "Evening Post"

The work of the Bowery Mission has shown no abatement during the summer months, and it is now about to enter upon its fall and winter campaign with great hopes and encouragements to carry on its rescue work among the 50,000 men who sleep in the Bowery lodging houses, and the still larger number of outcast, hopeless, and forlorn men, homeless, and poor to pay even for a lodging a bed. For all these the Bowery Mission has stood as a haven of rest, restoration, and rest for more than thirty years.

Our Money-Saving Magazine Combinations

The American Boy

Full of the reading that makes manly fellows. 500,000 careful parents endorse it. Boys everywhere are enthusiastic readers. The best boys are in danger of being lured away by cheap novels and wild story papers. Here is a clean, fascinating, inspiring magazine that satisfies the boy's craving for mental stimulant, gives him bright ideas for work and play, amplifies the knowledge he gets from his study, and supplements his home training.

The American Magazine

There will be a new novel by Frances Hodgson Burnett, author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy" and "The Shuttle"; more "Barbarous Mexico" articles, more of those delightful "Adventures in Contentment," by David Grayson; new stories by William J. Locke; articles by Samuel Hopkins Adams, Ida M. Tarbell, Ray Stannard Baker, Dr. William Osler, William Allen White, F. P. Dunne, and many others. The two most extraordinary and sensational series cannot yet be announced because the very announcement would shut off the information necessary to complete them.

Cosmopolitan

Cosmopolitan is strong, sane, and thoroughly American. It is progressive. Robert W. Chambers, Sir Gilbert Parker, Charles Edward Russell, George Randolph Chester, Samuel Hopkins Adams, Upton Sinclair, and many others contribute regularly. It always contains something of vital interest to women. It prints more and better pictures than the high-priced magazines. It is a "different" magazine because it covers an entirely different sphere. No matter how many magazines you read, you surely need the Cosmopolitan.

The Delineator

The Delineator is the fashion authority of the world. It tells what the American woman will wear. There will be fiction serials by Maurice Hewlett and George Barr McCutcheon, articles by David Graham Phillips, Samuel Hopkins Adams, Jack London and others. From the women by Gwendolyn Overton, Anne Forsythe, Rebecca Insley and others. Literature, art, the stage, domestic science, politics, education, religion, the care of the child—everything that pertains to the home—will be found in The Delineator.

Farm Journal

The standard farm and home paper of America: made for housekeepers, boys and girls, as well as fruit-growers, truckers, poultrymen, stockmen, dairymen, suburbanites and village people. It has always "stood up" for women. It is clean, brief, bright, "boiled down," intensely practical. "Cream, not skimmilk," is its motto. It is thirty-three years old, and known everywhere. "Judge Biggle" and "Peter Tumbledown" are characters better known to many than Hamlet or Micawber. Its poultry department is famous.

Good Housekeeping

Helpfulness. That's the idea that is now, and always has been, back of Good Housekeeping Magazine. Comfortable economy and easier living come naturally to those who read its pages. Real inspiration for lowering the cost of living, for bringing up children, for lessening housework, and for every littlest part of women's work as well, shines forth from every page—and besides all this the magazine is always interesting.

Hampton's Magazine

LaFollette, the fighting Senator from Wisconsin, will write a series of articles dealing with the country's most interesting economic, political and social problems. Judson C. Welliver, whose political articles are famous, will write for Hampton's, analyzing the political situation. General Theodore A. Bingham will reveal facts that should be known. The greatest short story writers, such as Robert W. Chambers, Arthur Stringer, George Randolph Chester, Frederick Palmer, Owen Johnson, Harris Merton Lyon and many others.

Search wherever you may, you will never find anything that, at the price, gives greater and more genuine satisfaction as a gift than a weekly or monthly magazine, which the whole year through reminds the recipient of the thoughtfulness of the giver.

NOTE—The matter on this page describing the Magazines is supplied by their respective publishers, for the information of our readers.

Harper's Bazar

Is the great magazine for the ambitious and thinking woman of to-day, whatever may be her station in life. The work the Bazar is doing has the co-operation of the best thinkers and writers in the world. During 1911, the Bazar will have a serial novel, "The Making of a Fortune," by Harriett Prescott Spofford, with illustrations by Alice Barber Stephens; short stories by Alice Brown, Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps; illustrations by Howard Chandler Christy, Rose O'Neill, Fanny Y. Cory, Frank Craig.

Little Folks

Love and joy and goodness will be presented in stories of real and of imaginary children and creatures and things. Besides the charming stories and pictures, there will be suggestions that will keep them happily busy in beneficial work or joyous play. The child will love the magazine, and will remember the donor with gratitude. Little Folks tells stories that are intense in interest, fascinating in fancy, charming in childishness, amazingly amusing, and real. Its pictures are delightful, artistic and numerous.

McClure's Magazine

It will be the best work that S. S. McClure, the greatest magazine editor of the day, ever produced. Its fiction will be the best money could buy in England and America. It will be the one indispensable, invaluable magazine—twelve issues of entertainment, help and pleasure for every good American home. Among the prominent features we mention a new serial by Mrs. Humphrey Ward—the most remarkable story since "Robert Elsmere," and a great article serial, to run a year, by George Kibbe Turner—"Money Masters of America."

The Modern Priscilla

Contains ideas and designs for making Ladies' and Children's Waists, Gowns, Neckwear, Hats and Underwear, Household Linens of every description. Illustrated instructions for all kinds of Art Needlework, French Eyelet, Cutwork, Cross Stitch, Shadow Work, Filet Guipure, Wallachian and all kinds of Lace, and the various stitches in Knitting and Crochet. Special departments devoted to China, Oil and Water Color Painting, Stenciling, Pyrography Leather Work, Art Brass Work and Departments, "Cooking," "Hostess and Guest," "Dressmaking" "Helps for Housekeepers," etc.

Pearson's Magazine

Aims to present information and entertainment—information on subjects which lie close to the heart of the average man—subjects which have to do with his daily expenses, his government, his health, his general welfare. Once in a while a foreign subject will be discussed, but only in its relation to the average American—or as entertainment. The Magazine is famous on two hemispheres for its fiction.

The Review of Reviews

Fifty magazines condensed for busy people. Always necessary, it is absolutely indispensable in these times of stirring public affairs, to the man who thinks and wants to know what is going on around him. It brings together the best that is in all the other important magazines and explains, through Albert Shaw's timely editorials, political issues, persons and all noteworthy events which you must know about. It is always fully informed, interestingly written and splendidly illustrated.

The World Evangel

Margaret Slattery's address on "The Charm of the Impossible" will run through November, December and January issues. The information which our special representative, Melvin G. Kyle, D.D., secured in the Imperial Ottoman Museum at Constantinople, will appear in early issues, fully illustrated. These archæological discoveries are of special importance to Old Testament studies on the 1911 Lessons. Its comments on the Sunday School Lesson aim at the moral and spiritual training of the child. Courses of Bible reading, etc.

World To-Day (The)

The one magazine indispensable to every home. A world review, furnishing monthly not only a complete digest of events, but many attractive articles on timely subjects, by noted contributors. In it you will find events, religion, travel, science, invention, art, drama, literature, education, etc., treated in a popular way, affording recreation for the idle hour, and, best of all, something worth while. In illustration it is a regular panorama of the world—many of the pictures being in colors.

Woman's Home Companion

Serial stories by Kate Douglas Wiggin, Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, Maude Radford Warren, Margaret Deland and the Williamsons. Hundreds of short stories by the most popular writers. Sam Loyd's Monthly Puzzle Page. Cutting Down the Cost of Living, Home Decoration and Handicraft, Woman's Problems, How to Make the Home Self-Supporting, Musical Instructions, Truth About Woman Suffrage. In 1911 a series of famous paintings reproduced on heavy rough art paper made possible by the Companion's exclusive control of a wonderful new art process.

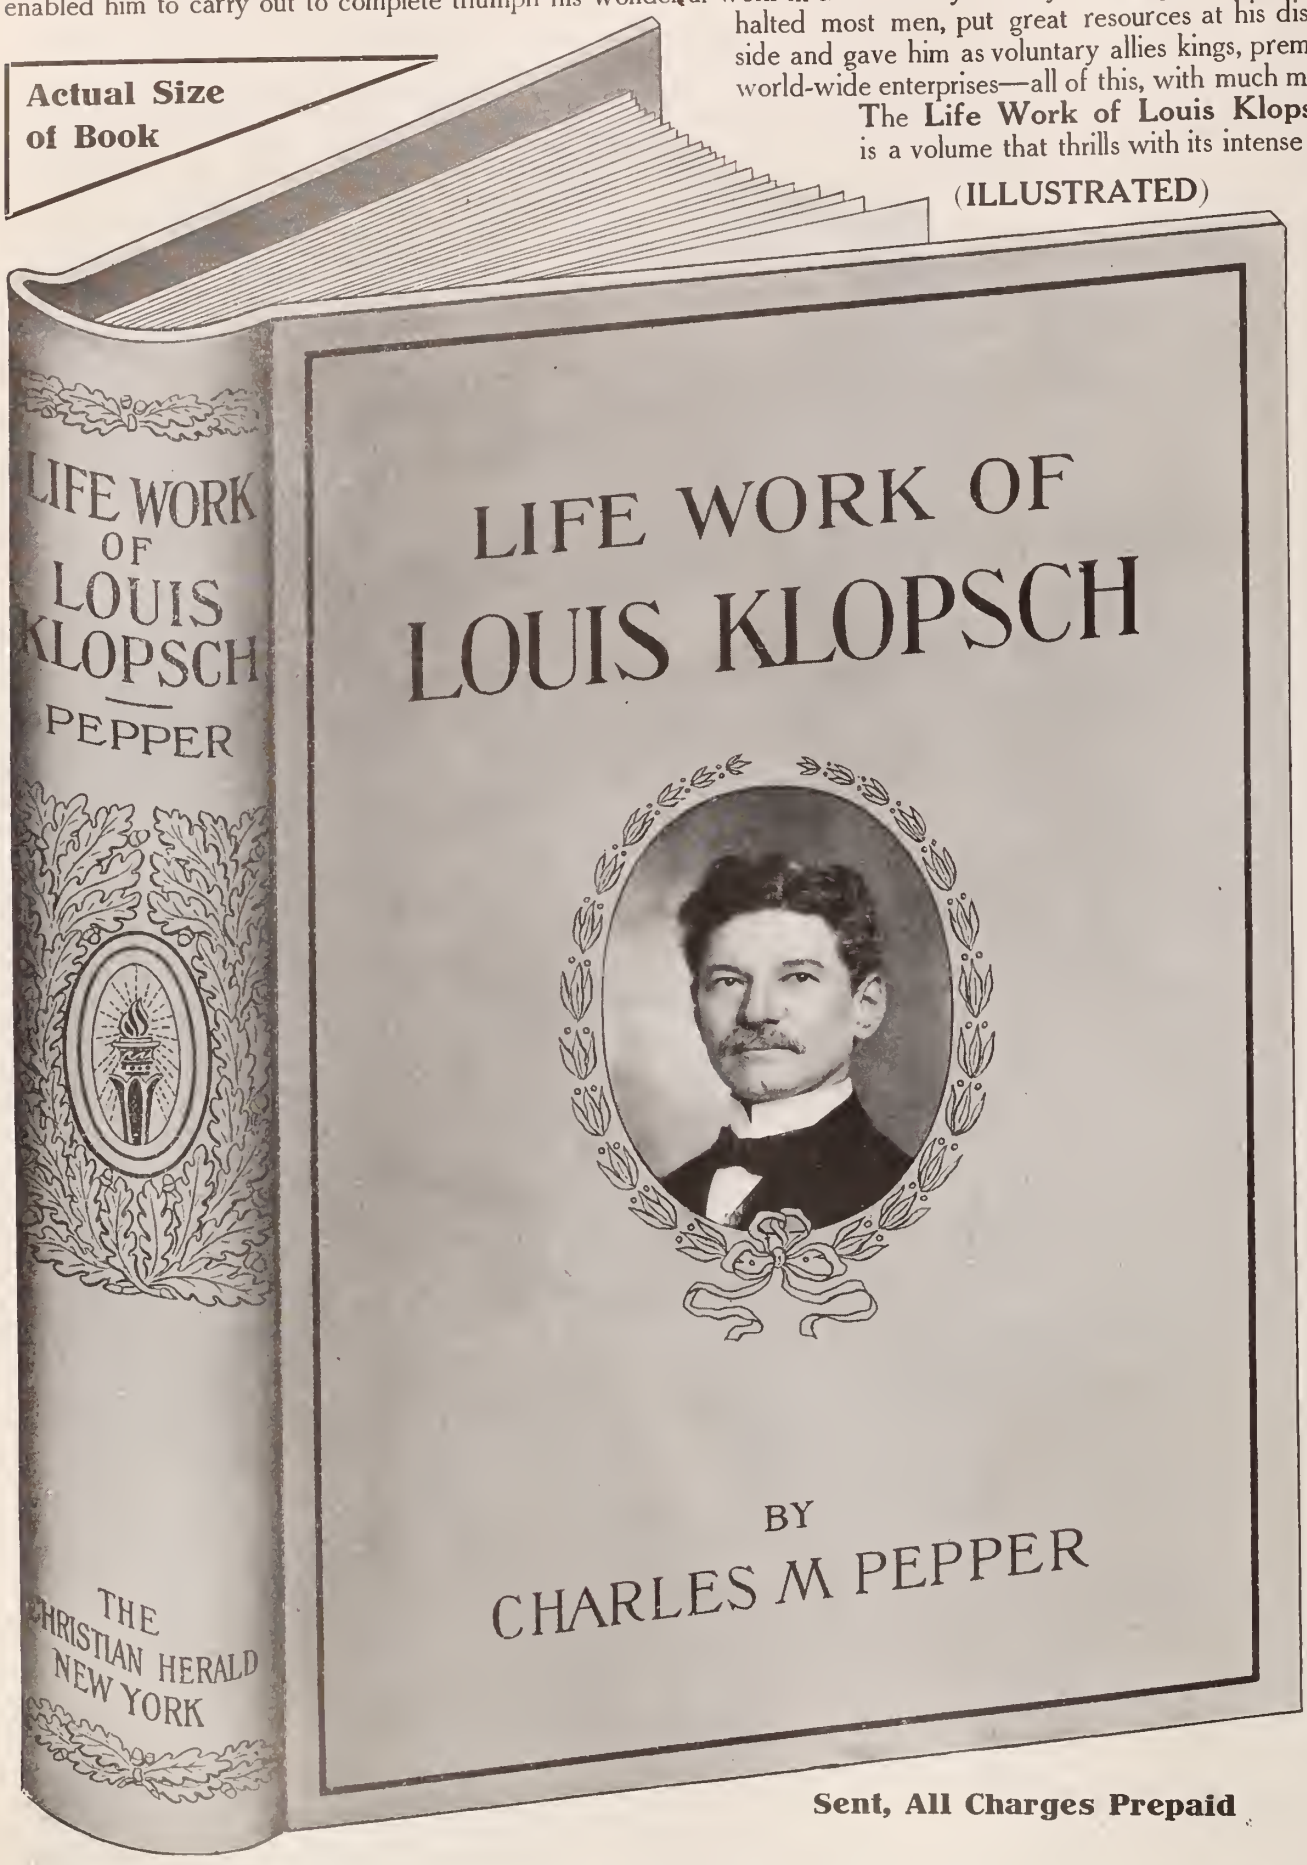
The Late Julia Ward Howe and Her Granddaughter

A Modern Captain of Philanthropy

LOUIS KLOPSCH, whom the whole world loved, left to every man and woman a rich legacy. He bequeathed to them the secret of his splendidly successful career. How he found the Master-key which opened doors that led to honorable service, and how he used it; how it enabled him to carry out to complete triumph his wonderful work in almost every country on the globe, helped him over difficulties that would have halted most men, put great resources at his disposal, brought powerful people to his side and gave him as voluntary allies kings, premiers, potentates, cabinets, to further his world-wide enterprises—all of this, with much more, is disclosed in Mr. Pepper's book

Actual Size of Book



(ILLUSTRATED)

The Life Work of Louis Klopsch is not an ordinary biography; it is a volume that thrills with its intense human interest and grips the attention from the first chapter to the close. We trace, step by step, the gradual development of the immigrant boy; we see him as the discoverer of the great secret almost at the outset of his business career, the possession of which transfigured his whole life. From that point onward it reads like a veritable romance.

A 20th Century Hero!

Guided by Mr. Pepper's vivid and realistic narration, we travel with Dr. Klopsch through the Western States in that terrible winter of 1892-93, when he succored our starving farmers. Then we go with him over sea to Russia, on his famous "mission of bread." We journey with him to Cuba, where he set food trains flying to save the starving reconcentrados. Now we spin along with him in a dog-sled over the frozen meres of Finland in mid-winter. Anon we wander at his side among the fever camps of stricken India, and listen to words of comfort for the suffering. We see him sending forth from the home ports his food-ships to far distant lands. We are spectators of his audiences with the Kings and Queens of Italy and Sweden, with the Russian Emperor at his summer palace at Tsarskoeselo and with high dignitaries in many lands, receiving congratulations and decorations.

Reads Like a Romance

The scene changes and we see him lovingly surrounded by the tenement waifs at the Children's Paradise which he created, and he joins in their games or leads them in song in the Children's Temple. We stand beside him as he speaks to the men of the Bowery Mission or gives food and kind, sympathetic words to the gaunt shadowy figures of the "Bread Line." Like the magician's carpet in the fable, this wonderful book takes us almost around the globe with Dr. Klopsch. We feel the thrill of his splendid courage and his enthusiasm, and as we share in his campaigns, we get a glimpse of high ideals, far beyond the ken of sordid souls—ideals that glorify and ennoble life and make it well worth living. Read this Great Book for yourself. Send for it to-day and learn and apply the wonderful Secret of a Successful Life which it illustrates so well. Wellman's Crew: Aubert, Wellman, Vaniman, Irwin, Lord, Simon

Mr. Wellman's Farewell as the Airship Started from Atlantic City

Copyright, Pictorial News Co

WELLMAN'S WONDERFUL FLIGHT

'T was a glorious attempt at what was generally considered the impossible which the explorer - Walter Wellman and his intrepid crew of five en made when they headed their great dirigible alloon, America, out over the Atlantic, with the etermination to drive it as far over sea as possible, ith the hope in their hearts that their landing place ight be somewhere on the coast of Europe. It tracts little from the credit due them that they ere unable to reach the other side and that their oyage ended on the gray waste of waters several ndred miles east of Hatteras; for before they ere taken aboard a steamer from ermuda they had journeyed more an eleven hundred miles over the ean under conditions which make l previous attempts at long cruises dirigible machines of any kind em puny achievements in compari-n.

-Mr. Wellman for several years has en experimenting with dirigible alloons, endeavoring to devise one hich could be used for exploration. e built a large airship called the merica and twice tried to make a ip northward across the arctic ice om Norway, in hopes that he could iscover the North Pole. Both at-mpts failed, the machine being rtly wrecked both times. Mr. Well-an, despite adverse criticism, kept t work to perfect his airship and repare it for another attempt at a ng distance air cruise. He rebuilt e America on a larger and stronger lan in this country, and being cked financially by the New York imes, the Chicago Record-Herald, nd the London Telegraph, he fitted e ship out for a trip seaward from tlantic City with Europe as its goal. e had with him some of the men ho had tried the flights toward the olar ice, and who were as experi-ced and determined as himself.

The new airship had a gas bag 228 et long. Below this was a steel car hich held the machinery and the o motors for propelling the craft, nd which was to serve as the living uarters for Mr. Wellman and his ew. Below the steel car was hung lifeboat to be used in making land-gs or to be their refuge if the bal-on was wrecked. The wireless pparatus run by J. K. Irwin was also installed in the lifeboat. Irwin, by the way, is the operator who received at the Cape Cod station the world-famed message, "C. Q. D." from Binns of the sinking steamer Republic. Below the airship hung a long steel cable, to which were attached thirty gasoline tanks. This was to drag through the water to keep the craft on an even keel, and was called the equilibrator. It proved a failure on the voyage, and Mr. Wellman believes a better one will have to be devised if Europe is to be reached by airship.

Wellman and his engineer Vaniman had braved a storm of criticism for two weeks for delaying the start, but they sensibly waited for what they considered favorable weather conditions. These came early on the morning of October 15.

It was still dark when word came from the weather bureau that the conditions seemed favorable for the daring attempt. The evening of the 14th the crew was ordered to spend the night at their quarters under the command of F. Murray Simon, in the hopes that the airship might be got away the next morning. If the weather conditions seemed favorable Mr. Wellman was to be informed at four o'clock A.M. At four Mr. Simon telephoned to Mr. Wellman and Mr. Vaniman that the air was calm and now was the time to get away. All of the America's crew at once hurried to the shed and began preparations for getting the craft off of its hangar. By eight o'clock preparations for the voyage were practically completed and the great gas bag was filled and tugging at its anchor ropes like some old-time monster of the air, captive but fighting to be free.

The Airship Drifting Away After the Rescue of the Crew

All of the inhabitants of Atlantic City who had got word of the proposed start were heading toward the shore. They came on foot, in automobiles, in carriages, in anything which would get them there in time to see the epoch-making event. Fifty policemen were on the ground along with men from the fire department to help launch the craft. The men of the crew shook hands with their friends and climbed first into the lifeboat and then up into the steel car. The calmest of them all was undoubtedly the kitten taken along as the airship's mascot. It blinked unconcernedly at the vast crowd and then settled itself comfortably in the lifeboat for a long nap, the first feline aeronaut on record.

Mr. Wellman bade farewell to his wife and entered the lifeboat. The crowd was in a fever of excitement. "Up and over!" "Up and across!" they began to shout, and Mr. Wellman called back cheerily: "Up for a trial, and only if the going's good, up and across!" Then he asked his secretary, "What does the weather man say now?" The airship was already rising, for the firemen and

The Defrauded Husbandman

TEXTS—Matt. 21 : 19; Rev. 21

THESE words about the failure of figs mean little to us; they meant much, however, to the pilgrims of the olden time. For Ireland, the failure of the potato means famine. For India, the failure of rice means the starvation of millions. For Palestine, the failure of the figs threatened all trade and travel. Our commerce is by car and ship, and provisioning the traveler is easy. With them, commerce was by means of a caravan, and provisioning was difficult. What little wealth Palestine had was through exchange with Egypt, and a wide desert separated the two lands. Once each week the camels bowed to receive their bales of goods with the leathern water bottles, and what was most important, a sack of dried figs. Every one of the resting places was known for its grove of fig trees.

The Dried Fig-Tree

When, then, Christ saw that the boughs held leaves, but no bunches of figs, he understood the peril that threatened the caravans and the wealth of the people. We explain that failure by the fig wasp, and the olive scale, while the disciples thought only of the curse of God. But with Jesus Christ the thought expanded, and he beheld the world as an Eden, an earth garden, in which God planted men as trees. Good men stood forth as trees planted by the rivers of waters, every one bringing forth his fruit in his season. Evil men stood forth with dry branches, and bare boughs. The scribes were fruitless trees, in that they had knowledge and yet with words darkened counsel. The Pharisees also had their forms, but no rich godliness. They too, were trees with leaves, but no fruit. The rulers had right feelings, but wrong actions. Gaunt, bare, unsightly, mere skeletons of trees were these! What a word of judgment is this, "They cumber the ground; hew them down and cast them into the fire, that they may be burned."

Culture without obedience is a tree that bears no fruit. By culture we understand familiarity with the best that has been said and done, plus the power to enjoy and use all the treasures in land and sea and sky. Cordial, therefore, the relations between culture and religion. This is the dictum of Christianity: "Wisdom is better than rubies, and knowledge is more precious than fine gold. With all thy getting of office and honor, fail not to get wisdom." We need not say that Christianity produced civilization, but we must say that Christianity has created the genial atmosphere that makes possible the fruits of civilization.

What Christianity Stands For

Christianity has lingered long in the gallery with the artists, but it has never had any affiliation with the evil resort. It has been a warm friend of the lecture hall, but it has been the enemy of the saloon. It has always kept good company. It has always stood for culture. To cultivate the intellect it has founded schools that give scholars; to cultivate the imagination it has strengthened literature and the arts. The Golden Rule has worked powerfully upon that type of manhood called a hero, a martyr, and a patriot. But there is a culture that stops short of obedience, and the surrender of the will to the laws of God, just as there are trees that blossom, but fall short of bringing forth fruit.

History is full of examples of scholars in whom conscience was atrophied. Solomon was the wisest man of his day, but also the wickedest. Alcibiades was the most brilliant pupil of Socrates, but he was also a scoundrel and a traitor. Lorenzo de Medici was a poet, an orator, a soldier, a man of letters, the most cultured man of his day; he also told lies, poisoned his enemies, murdered his friends, and finally he destroyed liberty. He wore his intellectual riches over a corrupt heart, as Naaman wore a purple robe over a leprous body. Culture may be only skin deep, just as the guides up Vesuvius tell the tourist that the soil and the grass are only spade deep. Without are the oranges, the vines, rich blossoms, the spirit of water, but all the time there is an undernote of rumbling, and here and there is a crack that emits hot steam, and hard by is a boiling spring.

Travelers are always conscious that beneath their feet lies a lake of fire that at any moment may break out, to bury hamlet or vineyard. The apostle of modern culture has told us that we have under-emphasized culture. He thinks that the Golden Age will come to any city that has noble halls for music, a forum for eloquence, public squares, beautiful statues, houses architecturally perfect, games, amusements, abundance, luxury. But on the slopes of Vesuvius there once was just such a city, that held all these signs of outer culture, and now that that old city has been uncovered, lo, its gold was mixed with clay, its art was united to vice, its beauty was unclean. To us it seems less like an injured angel of light than a beautiful demon of darkness. For knowledge must become character. Culture and refinement must be transmuted into loyalty and obedience. Wisdom rises into its best estate only when it surrenders itself to God. Of a truth culture without obedience is a tree without fruit.

Morality Fails Without Religion

Morality without religion is another fruitless tree. The schemes of morality are many. All alike emphasize the root virtues of conduct. Confucianism stands for morality, but it emphasizes good conduct from the viewpoint of reverence for one's ancestors. Buddhism stands for morality, but its viewpoint is that of contempt, contempt for one's self, to the end that the self may be annihilated, and the soul return to nothingness and a dreamless sleep. Judaism emphasizes morality. Job believed in right living when he called the roll of the duties toward friends, family, and his fellow sheiks, saying, "These duties have I fulfilled." In a similar mood the rich young ruler rehearsed the list of practical duties, and exclaimed, "All these have I done from my youth up." Important, also, these basic moralities. They free men from outbreaking vices and crimes. They encourage the simple virtues and hold at bay the great passions and crimes.

Morality touches the body, and forbids any injury to its delicate mechanism. Morality touches the neighborhood, and bids the youth carry himself so as to avoid the injury of his friends. Morality touches the realm of civics, and bids a man be a patriot. Morality touches the circle of politeness, and bids a man be a gentleman. But if it restrains the outer display of sin, it does not cure the source within. Morality without religion is not enough. At best it forbids the stroke, but not the secret hate that prompts the blow. It forbids the outer theft but not the inner. It puts a padlock on the lips, but leaves hate in the heart. God has built this world, not for the root moralities that support man. Industry is good—it is good not to lie and not to steal, and not to kill and not to perjure.

The Fruit of the Tree

But these beginnings are fundamental, and the man must go on from the leaf to the fruit. The fruit is truth in the inner parts, justice, measured by God's standard, mercy that tempers justice, love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith that trusts and will not be confounded. In April the peach orchard lends a faint pink flush to the distant hillside, and that stands for the moralities. In September the ripe fruit lends a golden blush of clustered fruit to the same hill, and that is the fruit of religion. Great is the importance of the root moralities, but roots and boughs imply the ripened fruit. What a word is this! "And Jesus saw that the tree held nothing but leaves." "Why cumbereth it the ground? Cut it down and cast it into the fire, that it may be burned."

Formalism without the vital spark of life is a tree that bears no fruit. By form is meant the rule and method. All thoughtful persons understand the value of practice and study.

Indeed, the whole philosophy of teaching is based upon imitation. We learn best by watching others do the thing in hand. The wisest teacher for th young orator is the great speaker. The artis pupil learns most rapidly by studying the artis master. The young beginner learns how to sin by listening to the singer, and practising hi method. In the religious realm we learn how to b a Christian by watching Christ and imitating hin But every method has the defects of its virtues and the rise of formalism is easily understoo One day, Moses, in the desert, saw the acacia bus Blazing, it was not consumed. For days that visio of God in the flaming bush was with him.

The Fire on the Altar

Long afterwards, in the period of doubt, he kep that vision burning by lighting a flame on an alta For Moses, it was an easy transition from the fir burning on the altar to that flaming bush in whic God dwelt. For Moses, that smoking altar was nc formalism; it was reality. The ceremony appeale to his imagination, suffused his eyes with tear made him bow his knees in the presence of that Go whose holiness was a consuming fire; he wept tear of penitence, and anew surrendered his will to th will of God. But when long time had passed, th fire on the altar became mere formalism. At th appointed stroke of the clock the priests kindled th flame and waved the censer of incense, and the went away to do injustice, to love cruelty, and t walk arrogantly before men.

Daniel, the captive, surrounded by enemies, an not knowing what hour would bring his death prayed three times a day, with his face set towar Jerusalem. For this youth, the prayer was ger uine, and form was the mere accident; but whe the Pharisees, who were in no peril, prayed thre times a day on the corners of the street, praye vociferously, that everybody might hear them, an with the praying grew ever more proud and puffe up, the form became an injury. Not but that writ ten prayers and the liturgy may serve some nature Lingering in foreign cathedrals, watching th priests bow and cross themselves, listening to th solemn chants and the prayers as intoned, you an I are helped—that is, for two or three times!

The Peril of Religious Formalism

You and I were so born that we are not ofte helped by prayers written by men who died thre hundred years ago, or by creeds that centuries ag were true to men's spiritual experiences. You woul not care to read the love letters of a grandfathe dead centuries ago, in the hour when you wer offering affection to the woman you love. Yo prefer to match your personal experience with you own words. You want the truth, the exact truth and in seeking it you must make the confession an prayer in the word to match exactly the penitenc and the feelings within. Nevertheless, you mus remember that other temperaments have thei liberty. They need to be kindled by other men' prayers and experiences, rather than by the creativ spark, or the gleam of light within. But there i no man living who is not in peril of formalism i his religious life.

The one need is the deepening of the tides o spiritual life. If the heart is aflame, the word will come. If the soul is glowing and throbbing with penitence and thanksgiving and love, the form will always be beautiful. Service, then, will be come easy. Give the singer genius, and technique will be easy. Kindle in the young poet the divine fire, and you need not trouble about the laws o poetry; he will invent new forms. Double the talen of this aspirant for eloquence, and you can tak him out of the school of elocution.

Pour out the tides of God's spirit on the Chris tian, and his whole life will become a psalm, his work be a prayer. Let the mind of Christ be i the disciple, and wisdom will be on his lips, th law of kindness in his tongue, and beauty wil adorn his prayer and his worship and clothe his life, as with the garments of God.

ow a Forest Fire Looks

READER of this journal in Goff, Kan., sends to THE CHRISTIAN RALD this realistic picture of the ho forest fires, which she received m her brother who writes as an eye-ness:

'We have had the coldest summer e I have ever experienced. June we had a frost that froze every-ng but the wheat; then again, about same time in July, another frost; d on August 13 and 14 it froze ice cker than good thick window glass. ice then we have had more nights of st than any other kind.

'About that forest fire I will tell u. Some one set it, they say, and I ve no doubt that is the case. We d wind all summer and that is un-ual here, and made it possible for fire to do what it did. The gov-ment made the timber into a re-ve; that is, it took it out of the rket or homesteads and leased it to sheepmen. Before they made the est into reserve, the settlers could sture their stock on it. They could wood or logs where they pleased. w, the sheepmen around Boise lease all or nearly all. If we get pasture re we have to pay for it.

'It (the fire) burnt millions of dol-s' worth of property and killed hun-eds of people; lots of them will never found. It killed over a hundred of ho's forest rangers—the bravest n who ever went to death. We uld see the blaze for three nights. ough it went clear across our State, passed to the north of us, about enty miles. It burnt the north end our county. You see a forest fire es not travel as fast as a prairie e; but it is harder to stop. One of se big green pines, when it's hot, I ect has two or three barrels of tur-ntine in it. We have measured some them that are over twenty-six feet und and two hundred feet tall. Lots them are two hundred and forty t. The green pine is hard to start, when it does get started, it makes ot hotter fire than the dry pine on ount of the turpentine.

'When just one big pine is on fire, u can't stand within fifty yards of and when a whole forest of those nts is in a blaze, it is terrible! It kes gas that floats in the air, burn-g as it goes. Clouds of fire destroy erything in the air that can be athed. The air becomes heated till heat is unbearable. For miles the ds, flying from the fire, send up uds of dust that are nearly as bad the smoke.

'I met a drove of cattle at that time. don't know how many head there re; it took me about half an hour to ss the drove, which was about a le and a half long. You could not the cattle till you got right among m. I only saw a cloud of dust com-g. They could not see me till they nearly against my horse; then they uld jump to one side, with staring od-shot eyes that looked ghastly.

'Of course the forest rangers could ve saved themselves, if they had not ght too long and stayed till it was late. They simply gave up their es trying to save others, and a cloud fire overpowered them, or they were shed by the falling trees. I heard a band of twenty that had been ding a guard. All at once, they rd a roar louder than usual, and king up, saw that the fire had over-vered another band, and had swept nd where they themselves stood on igh bluff. Then they sought shelter a mountain cave, where there was a ring; but it was of no use to any of m but one—he alone lived to tell out it. He is living yet, but is only wreck. He breathed that poisonous s just a few days before the fire ne.

'There are lots of forest rangers ned blind and crippled for life, and y have applied to the government help to take them to the hospital, l for medicine. The authorities y they can't help, because the law kes no provision for such things.

JOHN'S LETTER TO CHILDREN

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

IN what big book for grown people will you find the largest number of letters to little children? I hope you will not make many guesses before you say "The Bible." May I tell you about a letter that John, the beloved disciple, wrote to you? In this short letter John says "little children" nine times. Why did he write this letter to little children? He says: "My little children, these things I write unto you, that ye sin not." Then after telling some facts about the little children's best friend, he says: "I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you." Does he tell us how the sins of little children are forgiven? Yes. He says they are forgiven for Christ's sake.

The question I want to ask you to-day is: Do you believe that your sins have been forgiven for Christ's sake? I hear you answer, "Certainly, I believe, and I pray to God every day and thank him for what Christ has done for me." Then I want to ask you another question. Have you told the world that you believe that your sins have been forgiven? You remember Christ said that if we believe in him we should confess him before men. If you do not confess him you either do not believe in him or you are ashamed of him.

IF you were in a house that was on fire and some man whose clothes were all torn and who had been drenched with the hose and was covered with dirt should rush in and save you, would you be ashamed to take him to your home and tell papa and mamma that he saved you? Christ's coat was torn off and they spat on him, and he was nailed to a cross, and blood was running over him, but surely you should not be ashamed of him.

If you found the fireman who saved you was a king then surely you would be very proud of him. Christ who saved you is the King of Kings and the Lord of Lords.

WE are at the time of the year when the nights are long, and I want you to think about this to-night. Think hard, before you say your prayers. If you will promise to do this I will tell you a story I found and kept for you.

In visiting one of the large city hospitals, the visitor asked a nurse what was the most remarkable incident that she remembered in her long hospital experience. The nurse said: "I can tell you what was the most touching and impressive thing I ever saw in my hospital experience. It took place several years ago:

"THERE was a terrible accident in the city where I was then nursing, and two lads were brought in fatally mangled. One of them died immediately on entering the hospital; the other was still conscious. Both of his legs had been crushed. A brief examination showed that the only hope for the boy's life was to have them taken off immediately, but it was probable he would die under the operation.

" 'Tell me,' he said bravely, 'am I to live or die?'

"The house surgeon answered as tenderly as he could: 'We hope for the best, but it is extremely doubtful.'

"As the lad learned his doom, his eyes grew large and then filled with tears. His mouth quivered pitifully, and in spite of himself, the tears forced themselves down his smoke-grimed cheeks. He was only a lad, but he showed the courage of a man.

"AS we stood about him, ready to remove him to the operating room, he summoned up his fast failing strength and said: 'If I must die, I have a request to make. I want to do it for the sake of my dead mother. I promised her I would, but I have kept putting it off all this while.'

"We listened, wondering what the poor lad meant. With an effort he went on: 'I want to make a public confession of my faith in Christ. I want a minister. I want to profess myself a Christian before I die.'

"We all looked at each other; it was a situation new to our experience. What should we do? A nurse was sent for a clergyman. In the meanwhile we moved the boy upstairs to the operating room. There we laid him on the table. By this time the minister arrived. The boy welcomed him with a beautiful smile. The clergyman took his hand. I had been holding it, and it was already growing cold. The house surgeons and nurses stood reverently by. The boy began: 'I believe——' He faltered, for he could hardly speak above a whisper, he was so weak. I could not help crying. The surgeon did not behave much better. Not a soul in the room will ever forget the sight, nor the words when the boy said: 'I believe in Jesus Christ —his Son—our Saviour.' . . .

"HE stopped because he had not strength to say another word. Then the clergyman, seeing that the end was near, hastily put a small piece of bread in the lad's mouth, and a few drops of wine to his lips, thus formally administering the sacrament and receiving the lad from the operating table—into the company of those who profess the name of Christ. Summoning up all his strength, while the minister was praying, the boy said distinctly: 'I believe——' With these blessed words upon his lips he passed away.

"The surgeon put aside his knife and bowed his head. The Great Physician took the poor boy's case into his own hands. That, sir, was the most touching and beautiful thing I have ever seen in my hospital experience of almost twenty years."

A Unique Tea Party

AN interesting gathering took place recently at "Tennessee," Birmingham, England, the home of Mr. Charles M. Alexander, the well-known Gospel singer, when a number of policemen from the Moseley Village and King's Heath Police Stations, with their wives and friends, spent a pleasant afternoon in the beautiful grounds. "Tennessee," which stands on the boundary line between the districts of Moseley and King's Heath, comes under the surveillance of both police stations, and the property is therefore well guarded. It was the desire of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander to show their appreciation of the splendid services rendered by the force and the courtesy and consideration of its members, and their gratitude found expression in this little social gathering.

The afternoon was spent in games. At six o'clock an adjournment was made to the commodious tea-sheds, erected some years ago by Mr. Richard Cadbury, Mrs. Alexander's father. Here were long tables tastefully decorated, and covered with good things.

After tea, Mr. Alexander taught the company one of Mr. Harkness' newest choruses, "Traveling Home." He told how the inspiration for this song had come to Mr. Harkness at a meeting of commercial travelers in Portland, Me., and how these travelers had carried the song with them all over the United States. In a few minutes the whole company was singing with might and main:

Traveling home, traveling home,
Led by Jesus we are traveling home.
Traveling home, traveling home,
Led by Jesus we are traveling home.

It will interest members of the Pocket Testament League to know that the first policeman in Birmingham to join the League was a member of the Moseley Village Station. This station has practically formed the nucleus of the Pocket Testament League work amongst policemen throughout the world. Fifteen of the men present at the tea party were already members of the League, and before the gathering closed the remainder of the officers had joined. Each man was presented with a handsomely bound New Testament, and also a copy of a beautifully illustrated souvenir of the great Mission held in Australia last year.

Mrs. Alexander and her sister, Miss B. Cadbury, each spoke a few words of greeting. The party then concluded to the strains of "Traveling Home."

Earth's Treasures

OH, the trumpet of fame is calling,
And our hearts responsively beat,
And we dream in our wild ambition
That the world will bow at our feet;
And we scorn the humble and plodding
Who quietly walk on their way,
And we slight the simple duties
That fall in our path each day.

We are heaping up riches around us,
Till our coffers o'erflowing are filled;
We tear down our barns and build greater,
Till weary of gain we are wild;
And Satan the louder is calling:
"All this will I give thee if thou
Wilt give up thyself to my worship;
Thy knee will submissively bow."

So we go through the world on his mission,
Defrauding and robbing the poor,
And as fast as we heap up the riches,
We're heaping up sins at our door.
And the voice of the widow is crying,
And the orphans appealingly call;
And, ah me! so few benedictions
On the head of the rich man fall.

But monuments rise toward Heaven
To tell where the rich man lies;
For the ragged and wretched to gaze at,
Through famished and tear-dimmed eyes;
And palaces, grand and costly,
Are rearing their stately head;
While the homeless wanderer passes
With a shiver of wonder and dread.

But He who is wiser than proverbs,
And holier than mortal can be,
Who can know what is passing within us—
Look into our hearts and see,
Hath said that 'tis hard for the rich man
To enter the kingdom of love—
The kingdom of God our Father,
Of glory and beauty above.

New York's Great Electrical Show

IT was a far cry from the little electrical experiment of Ben Franklin, who drew electricity out of the sky with his key and kite, to the thousand and one devices now run by the same force at the great Electrical Show in Madison Square Garden, New York. Franklin enjoyed the good things of life in his day, but you felt sorry that he could not come back for an hour or two and pass with you from one fascinating booth to another—veritable homes of modern magic as they were—and see almost every service required in the house and in outside work done by the greatest force man has yet made captive.

Every one is not interested in electricity before he enters the great hall, but one soon becomes an enthusiast on the subject of cleaners, meals cooked without gas and its smell and danger or coal with its dust and dirt, flat irons which remain as long as you wish at the proper degree of heat, and innumerable other aids to living without wearing yourself out in the process.

It may be imagination, but it seems as if enough electricity had joined with the atmosphere of the hall to give you a feeling of exhilaration without putting a finger to one of the numerous machines for restoring your health with a medical battery. Perhaps it is the fact that everything you look at seems more interesting than the last that produces the effect. At any rate you want to see everything; you find you are not tired, and you go back to see the many interesting exhibits once more.

The permanent place taken in household economies by the vacuum cleaner is noteworthy. There are demonstrations conducted by a dozen different companies down the central aisles. In one a man is using a heavy cleaner, suitable for halls and public buildings. Noiselessly it draws into its capacious nickel throat dust and dirt from a carpet that would ordinarily resist the fiercest onslaughts of the ordinary brooms. Further on are others of lighter construction, suitable for home use, to be run by a light motor, which may be attached to the electric lighting system of a house. Some sand and dirt is walked onto a rug, the light aluminum cleaner is run over it, and it is gone, drawn into a dust-holding bag. The demonstrator gets dusty, he passes the machine over his clothes and hat, and they are spick and span once more. It is pointed at the walls, and draperies, paper and mouldings give up the dust which has gathered upon them. Sweeping made play, certainly; and then you pass on to discover new wonders.

Breakfast, mere man finds, can be made a matter of small effort with an electric cooking apparatus which sits on the breakfast table and cooks and keeps warm your toast, chops and coffee, and a few steel bars and wires. He resolves to get one and his wife smiles her approval. Ironing loses much of its nerve-racking drudgery when done as they do it in the electrical show, where the iron cannot get cold unless you turn off the current, with which you cannot burn your clothes even if you should be seized with such an insane desire. It is at the right heat—no more, no less—and you have good results anyway.

One young man is apparently enjoying much popularity among the fair sex. At last you get a flitting glimpse of a machine which he handles with the greatest ease—a little motor attached to a washtub, a wringer and a sink. He starts the motor, and a little wheel scrubs the clothes. A handle is turned, and the clothes pass through an automatic wringer. While this is being done the motor does a little work on the side, running an ice cream freezer and a sewing machine. There is a great heap of dirty dishes in the sink and the turn of a handle sets a mop to work which cleans them to the satisfaction of the most exacting housewife among the spectators. There are devices for heating water for the sick room, and to chase away neuralgia, rheumatism and other ills, while your complexion can be improved by an electric massage or your hair get a new lease of life by the application of the proper instrument.

Though it is the little devices that make housekeeping a joy and not a struggle, there are large exhibits of interest to the merchant and manufacturer. There are lighting systems by which the light of day is accurately reproduced, so that colors can be matched at any hour and in the most remote corner of a store. The government itself has declared that its imitation of the natural light of day is so perfect as to defy detection. Naturally storekeepers, remembering hundreds of customers who have brought back their goods "because they look different," have been pouring in their orders, and giving vent to sighs of relief at the same time.

A device for reading the time o' night on the ceiling attracted a large crowd of business men who live out of town and have to catch their early trains.

"It has always been the case that when a man wants to know what time it is in the night," said an exhibitor, "he fumbles for a match in the dark, strikes one and drowsily looks at the clock which is at the opposite end of the room or in the hall. If he is lucky, he has a clock which strikes when he touches a button. The clock invariably strikes the half hour of something—one bell—and the man is mad. This is the old way. The new way is different.

"As the man wakes up wondering what time it is, he puts out his hand and touches the button on a little electric clock such as is exhibited at the Electrical Show in Madison Square Garden. At once, the electric clock springs into a state of brilliant illumination and reflects its dial on the ceiling. The man does not move. He lies comfortably on his back and reads the time accurately indicated in the lighted reflection above his pillow. He releases the button; darkness again fills the room, and the man slumbers on in peace." ROBERT S. BLAIR

A REMARKABLE ZULU ENTERPRISE

REV. JOHN L. DUBE and his wife, native Zulus, are spending a few months in this country in the hope of obtaining support for the growing needs of the Zulu Christian Industrial School which they founded ten years ago. Mr. Dube comes to us armed with letters of recommendation from ministers of various denominations and from members of Parliament of the United Colonies of South Africa. There is also an American Committee in charge of the funds contributed for Mr. Dube's work, of which the Rev. Dr. Cadman, of Brooklyn, is chairman.

This man, John L. Dube, was first educated at the American Mission Station in South East Africa and afterwards at some of our American schools. On returning to South Africa, inspired by Booker Washington's example, he determined to try and do for his countrymen what this man has done and is still doing for the American negro. He started with but a few pupils of both sexes; there are now two hundred pupils taught by ten native teachers, one of whom teaches farming, and is paid by the Natal government. Printing, carpentry and blacksmith work are also taught. The Christian religion occupies a large place, as it is Mr. Dube's desire to have these young men and women go out as missionaries among their own people.

The needs of the school are more land for the purposes of agricultural training and more farm implements and tools. Mr. Dube hopes also to obtain the nucleus for an endowment fund which will place the school on a firm basis. He hopes to obtain the means of enlarging the school.

The fact that Mr. Dube's school was founded by a native Zulu acting on his own initiative, and has worked, partly under European advice, almost entirely by native teachers, is a hopeful augury for the future.

The best man to help is the one who shows signs of a desire to help himself, and the fact that a number of Zulu men and women are endeavoring to pass on to their fellow-countrymen the benefits they themselves have received from white missionaries is an indication that the seed sown is taking root.

Warding Off the Cholera Plague

THE United States government is making every effort to exclude from this country the plague of cholera, which is now raging in certain parts of Europe and which has been attended by frightful loss of life. Fortunately, our facilities for barring out disease are much better to-day than they have ever been in the past. This is due to the development of the United States Public Health and Marine Hospital Service during recent years. This branch of our national government has jurisdiction over all government hospitals and is charged with the conduct of the quarantine service, with its cordon of stations and vessels along our coasts.

Time was when the Public Health Service was a somewhat insignificant branch of the government; but with the growth of public sentiment in behalf of preventive measures, there has come a new appreciation of its value. The Service, as reorganized and extended, has authority to take drastic measures when necessary. Especially has its usefulness been enhanced through the extension of the activities of a hygienic laboratory, established at Washington, D. C., for the investigation of contagious and infectious diseases.

The Surgeon-General, who is the executive head of the Bureau of Public Health and Marine Hospital Service, is charged with the framing of regulations for the prevention of the introduction and spread of contagious disease.

When the present cholera menace first assumed threatening form, Surgeon-General Walter Wyman held conferences with health officers and quarantine officials at all the leading ports by which immigrants enter the country from Southern Europe, and formulated those stringent quarantine regulations which are now in effect, and which have resulted in all suspicious cases being isolated immediately upon arrival in this country. At the same time plans were made to have the national hygienic laboratory make examinations in all suspected cases of cholera. The institution at the seat of government is the only one in the country having the serum for making the final and conclusive test as to the presence of cholera, and cultures are sent there for examination whenever the officials at any port encounter a suspect, regarding whose status as a possible cholera victim or "carrier" they have the slightest doubt.

The Surgeon-General has called in council the Advisory Board for the Hygienic Laboratory to discuss the situation. This body of medical experts represents the highest modern skill and knowledge in this important sphere. Among the members are such famous men as Professor William H. Welch of Johns Hopkins University, probably the greatest living authority on the questions involved in the present crisis; Dr. Simon Flexner, head of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research; Professor Wm. T. Sedgwick of the Massachusetts Institute of Technoloy; Professor Frank Westbrook of the University of Minnesota; A. D. Melvin, chief of the United States Bureau of Animal Industry, and representatives of the medical departments of the army and navy. The purpose of this council is to consider emergency measures for the present danger, and to study the cholera germ as scientists. This learned body is not limiting its investigations to cholera, but is grappling with other serious problems affecting the public health. Investigations are being made with reference to leprosy, cancer, pellagra, hookworm and infantile paralysis—the last-mentioned disease being the newest and one of the most dreaded of the various afflictions that have visited this country in recent years.

Revolutionists Covering a Public Square with Their Artillery

THE first photographs of the revolution in Portugal have reached New York and two of them are reproduced on this page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They show the revolutionary troops (including not only republican citizens, but regular soldiers and marines) in the public squares of the capital, moving the guns behind the street barricades and guarding the royal palace after the flight of Manuel and his court to Cascaes. Ex-King Manuel has now arrived in England. He reached Plymouth on October 19. A correspondent writes to the New York Tribune: "It is doubtful whether any former king has ever landed surrounded by such an air of incomprehensible mystery. He arrived without accompaniment of salutes or civic ceremonies. He was almost smuggled in and whisked away, as if Plymouth were full of bomb throwers. He looked pale and ill. Very gravely he shook hands with some dozen equally grave men in frock coats and silk hats. He spoke several sentences to them, but never once did a smile relieve the gloom of his pale and tragic young face. Then he stepped into a waiting carriage, accompanied by the Queen-Mother Amelie. She, too, looked pale and very unhappy. The Duke of Orleans, the Marquis de Soveral, the Portuguese Minister, and the Spanish Ambassador, welcomed the royal exiles, who at once started on a special train for Wood Norton, Evershame, Worcestershire."

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

THE GREAT October hurricane which swept Florida, October 17 and 18, caused the loss of several lives and damage to property estimated at nearly $4,000,000. The Florida orange crop is probably ruined.

PRESIDENT TAFT had an opportunity, during a recent visit to Ellis Island, to find out something about the woes of immigrants and the tribulations of the department officials. He personally questioned some of the new arrivals and took an active part in the examination of a dozen cases that had been scheduled for deportation.

—PORTUGAL is, in a sense, the scene of a religious reformation as well as a political revolution. It is the revolt of the Catholic population against Church domination and selfishness. There is now hardly a doubt that, had the Church represented the real interests of the people, there would have been no revolution.

—IT NOW SEEMS likely that the name of Edgar Allan Poe will this year be added to those of the other "Immortals" in the Hall of Fame. Forty new names may go on the tablets. Three of the new places have been set aside for women.

—IN CONSEQUENCE of failing health, Justice William R. Moody of the United States Supreme Court has resigned his post. President Taft's letter, accepting Justice Moody's resignation, pays a very high tribute to his character.

A Power for Righteousness

"THE happy family," says an old proverb, "is one in which there are no secrets." We think this is pretty sound philosophy, and so, to put it into practice, we take pleasure in informing the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Family Circle from time to time just how their favorite journal is progressing; for that it continues to go on at an amazing rate, you readily admit, when you consider the increased volume of its business and its steadily mounting circulation. We are ambitious, however, to see it mount still higher, in order that it may have a wider field of service for God and humanity.

We had something to say last week concerning these matters, but there is evidence which is still more conclusive of the "upward and onward" trend of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and it is to be found in the official Post Office records. There has been a huge increase in the net weight of the editions we are now sending out regularly through the mails, contrasted with those of preceding years. Here are the official figures for the past nine months of the current year, which you may compare with those of the same months in the two preceding years, bearing in mind that they are taken from the Post Office official receipts and, of course, cannot be controverted as evidence of the remarkable growth of your favorite journal:

A grand total of 2,501,156 pounds of CHRISTIAN HERALDS mailed to subscribers this year up to September 30, as against 1,648,751 pounds during the same period last year, and 1,402,725 pounds in the same months two years ago.

Now, just glance at these figures a moment. They show that the increase during the nine months of 1910, over the same months a year ago, was 51 per cent., and over two years ago 78 per cent. This not only means a greater number of pages per issue, but a vast increase in the quantity and variety of reading matter, and a far bigger Family Circle of readers than we have ever had in the past. We are conscious of several causes for this growth, but the principal reason we feel to be that, under divine Providence, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S loyal adherence to the high religious and philanthropic ideals which marked its course under Dr. Klopsch's management, has won the approval of right-thinking people all over the land, and is bringing hosts of new friends to join the ranks of the old. It is impossible for any editor, no matter if he had the wisdom of Solomon (which we haven't), to divine the mind of his readers; but there is no mistaking their point of view in the letters we are receiving daily, which are so full of hearty approval of the paper that we sometimes feel the need of a special dispensation of meekness to keep us from being spoiled by such abounding cordiality. Of course, the only way of showing how we value their generous sentiments is to go on making THE CHRISTIAN HERALD better than ever! This we are planning to do on a large scale for the coming season, and we give our readers warning that there are pleasing surprises in store for them.

It was a favorite saying of Dr. Klopsch:

"Do all the good you can
To all the people you can."

We commend this to the Family Circle. If every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were to make an effort to bring into the Circle one more subscriber, the paper would then reach such a multitude of homes that it would become a mighty influence for right living, Christian citizenship and home happiness. We pray that it may be so used of God that it will be a power for national righteousness. You can help to bring this about. And in so helping you will be doing the best kind of missionary work within your own sphere of opportunity—a work that cannot fail to result in blessing to all of us.

Wellman's Flight

WHILE Walter Wellman did not succeed in astounding the world by crossing the Atlantic in his big dirigible America, he vindicated his claim to aeronautic daring and established a record for endurance which may stand unequaled for some time. From the outset to the finish, his venture had the appearance of foolhardiness. Among experienced aviators probably not one in a thousand expected he would go as far as he did. Yet the dreams of science are long ones and they tell us of a day when the bird-men will fly vast distances with a speed far greater than any yet attained. People laughed at Columbus when he set out on his trans-Atlantic voyage, just as they have laughed at every bold pioneer who takes his life in his hand in a new venture. They laughed at "Edison's toy"—now the incandescent light—and they laughed at John Ericsson, and at George Stephenson; they set down the Wrights as cranks when they experimented with their "glider" in the early aeroplane days. They may smile at Wellman; but the true scientist will find in his effort, splendid as it was even in its failure, a new source of inspiration in the great campaign for the conquest of the air.

The Season of Tumult

AS the political campaign draws to a close and the shouting of the great national "talk fest" is nearly ended, the average American citizen is glad of the prospect of relief from the surfeit of discussion which has occupied the last six weeks. It has been a period of unusual excitement and the furious contention of the various factions, with their charges and counter-charges, has been even more pronounced than in recent years. But while in the great game of politics these vivid passages may amuse the practical politicians, they are by no means edifying or agreeable to the general public. Besides, each candidate of importance has his hired trumpeters who, with pen and voice, deluge the opposition with slander and rancor, which are returned with liberal interest. This goes on at a tremendous rate until thoughtful people stand amazed and dismayed. Worthy candidates, who had believed themselves possessed of fairly clean records, find themselves pictured as creatures so vile that they feel like surrendering to the nearest sheriff and going to hide in jail. Every public man, at such a time, is presented in a double role: as a good, patriotic citizen, and as a despicable corruptionist and a dangerous foe to honest government. It's a sorry spectacle, but apparently unescapable under existing political conditions. Meanwhile, our readers can console themselves with the agreeable reflection that there is one paper, at least, that isn't given over to partisanship and to which, while the tumult rages elsewhere, it is a comfort and a pleasure to turn for real, rational enjoyment. This they find in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Found Out

WHEN Governor Hughes of New York was fighting the race-track gamblers two years ago, there were sundry intimations of the existence of a big corruption fund. It was to be used in buying votes in the State legislature to defeat the anti-betting laws. But so strong was public sentiment in favor of those laws, that the bribers' schemes ignominiously failed and the bills were passed. People had well-nigh forgotten the episode, when lo! a joint legislative investigating committee has succeeded in unearthing evidence showing that a bribery fund of $500,000 was actually distributed and giving the names of the corruptionists and the circumstances of their crime. Several rich patrons of the race-track are involved, and there is a fair probability, if justice be not thwarted, that prison doors may suddenly open for a number of the b e-takers, if they do not take to flight meanwhile. ll deeds cannot long be concealed. The world arc d us is like the icy glaciers that creep from the m n-tain tops into the Swiss valleys. By a strange w of nature every object hidden in the glacier com to the surface at length. So sin is somehow alw ys moving toward the surface.

Foul deeds will rise,
Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes.

Stunned by the sudden and unexpected expos e, after two years of fancied security, the pligh of these wrongdoers is surely a striking proof of ne truth of the divine warning in the old Book: Be sure your sin will find you out."

The Passion for Antiques

THERE is a good deal of picturesque romanc as well as profit in the business of importing n-tiques, which is engaging so deeply the attentio of the New York Custom House authorities just : v. Altars and church decorations, the work of ne master artificers in Spain and Italy centuries ; ; old monkish carvings quaint and beautiful; ne artistic belongings of grand old chateaux and pal es that have gone to ruin; fountains, statuary, d even entire dwellings have been bought by spec a-tive dealers and shipped to this country to be ld at fabulous prices to rich people with a love r antiques. Profits of six and seven hundred er cent. are not uncommon in the business. Whol le undervaluation frauds, which are said to have e-frauded the government of large amounts in du s, are now under investigation. Rich Americans re the best buyers of antiques in the world to-day d their liberal prices make the dealers' attempt to defraud Uncle Sam's customs by undervalua n inexcusable.

—BISHOP WEEKLY, in the United Brethren Conferenc at Dallastown, Pa., recently broke a lance with those pastors ho are known as "ladies' men," who are constantly in the m-pany of the women of their congregations, and who seem af to remonstrance. The bishop declared that the pastoral th of such men may be traced by "wrecked families and churc ," and that they should be "relegated to the shelf." So stro a note should act as a wholesome deterrent to those who, i he desire to be agreeable, may sometimes be apt to forget the g-nity that is due to the pulpit.

Cyclone Sweeps Cuba

THE island of Cuba has possibly suffered the greatest material disaster in its history in the storm which began with light rains on Octo-ber 13, developing into floods and devastating hur-icanes which continued until Monday, October 17. The damage was chiefly in the western half of the sland. The cyclone swept over Matanzas, Pinar el Rio and Havana Provinces. Hundreds of lives re believed to have been lost, thousands are home-ess and property valued at millions of dollars has een destroyed by the cyclone. Havana was at one ime under four feet of water for a distance of ine blocks from the sea wall on the northern border f the city. Large buildings in the path of the torm have been thrown down and vessels in the arbor have been torn from their moorings and wrecked. The towns of Martinez, Guane, LaGrifa, Punta Cartes and Cortes are reported to have been estroyed, and the greater part of Artemisa, a hrifty town on the boundary of Havana Province, s reported to be in ruins. Thirty persons were rowned at Consolacion del Sur. A barge on board f which was the recently recovered oremast of the Maine, together with tools and apparatus used in ne work of raising the wrecked attleship, was driven ashore at the oot of Morro Castle, and conse-uently the work of raising the Maine will be greatly delayed. resident Gomez personally visited ne inundated sections of Havana, irected the work of rescue, encour-ged the soldiers, police and firemen their tasks, visited the injured in ne hospital, and made arrange-ents to provide quarters for the omeless in the barracks and other overnment buildings. But the urricane did not confine its devas-tations to Cuba. It swept the Gulf ith merciless fury. The storm ent tearing through the streets of ampa, Fla., at the rate of sixty iles an hour. The gravest fear as entertained for all the cities in ne southern part of Florida. The reckage of the tornado was so reat it was feared that national d might be needed by the storm-vept cities and communities, hich aid would have been freely ndered. We live in a world dreadful cyclones as well as entle zephyrs, which produce cau-on, prudence, courage, enterprise, nd whose calamities call out the veetest sympathies and reveal a niversal brotherhood. The tears the civilized world will fall at the lamity and its prayers will ascend heaven for those who have suf-red most by its deadly sweep. It sed to be thought that such dis-rbances in nature as the hurri-ne were a penalty visited upon e communities for their sins. hat is not the Christian belief of -day, for the misfortune falls on the good as well as the wicked. torms are necessary for the puri-cation of the atmosphere in the mental and moral as well as material realm. Those who build cities ear the craters of volcanoes, along the possible ams of earthquake, and on the shores of storm-ept seas, do so at their risk, and though the calam-es are heart-breaking they cannot be considered as punishment of Providence. The ancient Hebrews, ho laid much emphasis upon earthly reward and nalty, counted the cyclone as the scourge with hich God punished his enemies, and hence they ayed:

So persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with storm. (Ps. 83:15.)

Forts and Harbor of Havana, Swept by the Recent Cyclone

ew Three Thousandfold

Mrs. Gentry, who lives in an English village, dug t a pit in the corner of her garden. She put half inch of soil between one grain of wheat, which e placed in the bottom of the pit, and the sub-soil gravel. The top of the pit was about one yard ross. This was done in March, 1909. After a w weeks, the grain had half a dozen shoots; from en till harvest the sprouting grain was covered er and over again, until the pit was leveled up, and grass of wheat clothed the whole of the yard-wide cle. During the winter this small crop of wheat remained quiescent and last spring it began to grow rapidly, growing beautifully through the summer until a few weeks ago, when it was ripe for cutting. Mrs. Gentry gathered her wheat crop, covering an area of six square feet. She had in her harvest eighty-five stalks of wheat; twenty ears were of large size and the grain of good quality; fifty were of medium size and a little below the average in quality, while the remaining fifteen were unripened. There were in all 2,800 grains. This marvelous instance of reproduction in the agricultural realm is a type of the wonderful growth and multiplication in the spiritual realm.

Now he that ministereth seed to the sower both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness. (II. Cor. 9: 10.)

Profitable Invention

James Leach, a negro who used to work in the Glendenning handkerchief mills of Passaic, N. J., has just invented an improvement to the phonograph, which has brought to him a fortune. He is an expert mechanic and insisted that he could improve the tone of the talking machine, and set himself to work experimenting. The Edison Company, hearing of his efforts and ambitions, invited him to their works, where he demonstrated the success of his new idea, for which it is said they gave him $62,000. Unfortunately few of the inventors make very much money out of their discoveries. It is left usually for the man who capitalizes the invention to get what financial profit there is in it. Mr. Edison is one of the rare exceptions, and has been wise enough to retain enough stock in the companies that manufacture his invention to make him rich. No one begrudges this colored man the thousands of dollars his new idea has brought to him. The bright thoughts of God which men find in nature and the Holy Scriptures, while sometimes having a mercantile value, are in fact above all price. The pricelessness of wisdom is beautifully described in the Scriptures:

No mention shall be made of coral, or of pearls; for the price of wisdom is above rubies; the topaz of Ethiopia shall not equal it, neither shall it be valued with pure gold. (Job 28: 18, 19.)

Padding the Government Census

The inhabitants of cities are always delighted at their rapid growth, and in the greed for a large population it is said that many of them have padded the late government census returns. It is charged that this crooked work has been carried on in Tacoma, Seattle and Aberdeen, Wash.; Portland, Ore.; Minneapolis, Minn.; Boise, Idaho; Fort Smith, Ark.; and a number of other cities. It is claimed that names were copied from the head-stones in the graveyards and recorded among the living, and that names were even spun out of the web of imagination to swell the census return. Census Director Durand set forth these charges of fraud in a letter to Secretary Nagel of the Department of Commerce and Labor, who wrote President Taft on the subject and received from him the following reply: "The cases of all those who appear to have violated the law should be investigated by the Grand Jury, and if sufficient evidence is found to justify it they should be indicted and prosecuted at once. Nothing will so conduce to securing a proper census as the prosecution of those who attempt a fraud on the law. I am led to believe that the present census has been much freer from attempted frauds than any previous census, but the instances cited by Mr. Durand are sufficient to require the utmost vigilance to bring those who have violated the law to justice and proper punishment." Frauds usually are for money. These census dishonesties are the offspring of ambition. They are against the millions of inhabitants, against the government itself, and those who are guilty of such crimes ought to be tracked and punished. The prophet gives a very good description of people of this class when he says:

And they will deceive every one his neighbor, and will not speak the truth; they have taught their tongues to speak lies, and weary themselves to commit iniquity. (Jer. 9:5.)

Rockefeller Founds New Hospital

At the opening of the New Hospital in Sixty-sixth Street, New York City, October 17, Mr. John D. Rockefeller made it a gift of $3,820,000. It is to be an adjunct of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research for the study of human diseases in addition to the laboratory research work that has been carried on by the Institute for eight years. This gift brings the total income-bearing endowment of the Institute to $6,420,000. The total of Mr. Rockefeller's gift to the Institute, including land and buildings, and earlier gifts for medical research, is $8,240,000. This new hospital, which has been two years in building, is the only institution of its kind in the world—a place where close study is made of a few selected diseases that now baffle medical science. No charge will be made for board, lodging, medicine, nursing, or medical attention, and no liberties will be taken with the patients in the way of experiment. Only three or four diseases will be under investigation at any one time, and no patient, rich or poor, will be admitted unless suffering from one of these. There are but seventy beds in the hospital, and the equipments in every department are as nearly perfect as the ingenuity of man can make them. The medical staff of the hospital will consist at the outset of the director, Dr. Rufus I. Cole, Dr. Christian A. Herter, Dr. C. C. Robinson and four internes. The Board of Scientific Directors, which will have full control of the activity of the entire Institute, will be Dr. T. Mitchell Prudden, Dr. L. Emmett Holt, Dr. Christian A. Herter, Dr. Simon Flexner and Dr. Hermann M. Biggs. Mr. Rockefeller has undertaken by this mammoth foundation to find cures for diseases that have heretofore been considered incurable, and those who are engaged in his institution entertain the belief that their scientific investigations and experiments will be rewarded by discovery of the individual microbes in the diseases that have so decimated the race, and also the weapon with which they shall be able to destroy those microbes; and thus by the miracle of modern medical science the brittle thread of human life will be lengthened out. Hezekiah had a fatal malady. He prayed to God to spare his life. His prayer was answered, but it was necessary for him also to make use of medical science at the command of the prophet in the use of the poultice of figs.

For Isaiah had said, Let them take a lump of figs, and lay it for a plaster upon the boil, and he shall recover. (Isa. 38:21.)

Julia Ward Howe Passes Away

She Was the Author of the "Battle Hymn" and the Best Loved American of Her Day

WITH the death of Julia Ward Howe, who passed away at her home in Middletown, R. I., on October 17, one of the greatest women our country has ever known is lost to the American people. Her name, her gracious personality and the memory of her splendid intellectual and patriotic achievements, however, will long be cherished in the land of her birth. She was born in New York City, May 27, 1819. Her father, Samuel Ward, a prominent banker, was the grandson of Governor Samuel Ward of Rhode Island, who was a member of the first and second Continental Congresses. Her paternal grandfather was an officer in the Revolutionary War, and her paternal grandmother, the daughter of Governor Greene of Rhode Island. Her mother, Julia Cutler, the grandniece of General Francis Marion, a descendant of the French Huguenots of South Carolina, was a woman of marked literary ability and had some success in authorship.

One of Mrs. Howe's biographers has this pleasant sketch of her girlhood: "Julia and her two sisters were called in the old New York the 'three graces,' though Mrs. Howe in a description of herself later says that she left her sisters to 'do all the beauty of the family.' Julia was sixteen when she made her first attempts at poetry, which were published in a daily paper called The American. Her first prose composition was a review of Lamartine's Joeelyn, which was published in the Literary and Theological Review. In 1841, when the family were spending the summer near Boston, Julia met Dr. Samuel G. Howe, the philanthropist and educator, who had fought with the Greeks against the Turks in 1824 and who was at the time teaching the blind and deaf-mutes. Their marriage took place in 1843 and was followed by a tour through Europe, where Julia Ward Howe met the men of literary distinction of the older country —Dickens, Moore, Foerster, Rogers, Carlyle, Milnes, Sidney Smith and others."

It was after her marriage that Mrs. Howe's literary career really had its beginning, although she had spent the years of her girlhood largely among books. At twenty she had written her first book of poems, entitled Passion Flowers, which attracted much attention. She was deeply interested in philanthropic work, and it was her sympathy with suffering humanity that first drew her toward the distinguished educator and philanthropist who became her husband. After her marriage she devoted herself more and more to literary and philanthropic work. In the great struggle which preceded the Civil War she took an active part with her gifted pen.

Orison S. Marden, in his biographical reminiscences of Mrs. Howe, tells the story of her most famous poem, "The Battle Hymn of the Republic":

"It was in the first year of our Civil War that Mrs. Howe, in company with her husband and friends, visited Washington. During their stay in that city, the party went to see a review of troops, which, however, was interrupted by a movement of the enemy, and had to be put off for the day. The carriage in which Mrs. Howe was seated with her friends was surrounded by armed men. She began to sing, to the great delight of the soldiers, 'John Brown.' 'Good for you!' shouted the boys in blue, who, with a will, took up the refrain. Mrs. Howe then began conversing with her friends on the momentous events of the hour, and expressed the strong desire she felt to write some words which might be sung to this stirring tune, adding that she feared she would never be able to do so. 'She went to sleep,' says her daughter, Maude Howe Eliot, 'full of thoughts of battle, and awoke before dawn the next morning to find the desired verses immediately present to her mind. She sprang from her bed, and in the dim gray light found a pen, and paper, whereon she wrote, scarcely seeing them, the lines of the poem. Returning to her couch, she was soon asleep, but not until she had said to herself, 'I like this better than anything I have ever written before.' "

Mrs. Howe has written many books, besides poems, essays and addresses, but the "Battle Hymn of the Republic" is the production by which she is best known, and which she herself loved best of all. The poem is given below in full, as she wrote it:

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord:
He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath a stored;
He hath loosed the fateful lightning of His terrible swor
His truth is marching on.

I have seen Him in the watch fires of a hundred circling camp
They have builded Him an altar in the evening dews and damp
I can read His righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamp
His day is marching on.

I have read a fiery Gospel, writ in burnished rows of steel:
"As you deal with my contemners, so with you my grace sha deal;
Let the Hero, horn of woman, crush the serpent with his he Since God is marching on."

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retrea
He is sifting out the hearts of men, before His judgment sea
Oh! be swift, my soul, to answer Him! be jubilant, my feet!
Our God is marching on.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in His bosom that transfigures you and me;
As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free.
While God is marching on.

A Memorial Tribute

GONE in the fulness of years and of wisdor
Gone to the heavenly rest,
Away from the surge of life's madness,
Ripe for the Master's behest;
She has passed through the gates we must enter
Her journey, though long, is now o'er,
Her bountiful harvests are garnered
On Eternity's mystical shore.

Lay her down gently, for gentle was she,
Lay her there where the wild lilies spring
For the lily's pale chalice, as pure as the snow,
To her was a sensitive thing;
Meet emblem, too, of her beautiful life,
The lily, so chaste and so fair,
A type of the purity, modesty, love,
Which distinguished her everywhere.

She wrote of the lilies that bloom o'er the s
'Mong whose beauties the Christ came to eart
And she told of the glory transfiguring mer
That surrounded His manger at birth;
Now her Christ and her King, He has called her,
"No trumpet shall sound her retreat,"
"May her soul be swift to answer Him,
And jubilant be her feet."

BY THE GLOW OF THE FIRELIGHT

Winter and Leisure

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WHETHER or not winter brings you leisure depends not a little on where you live. For those who are much in society, who look forward to a giddy round of afternoon teas, receptions, concerts and other diversions, the inclement weeks on which we are entering are the busiest and most breathless of the year. We fancy that only a small portion of those who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD waste life in this way. Most of our readers are too sensible for this. No form of effort dissipates energy and induces nervous exhaustion with such unerring certainty as indulgence in an incessant round of fashionable amusements. A strenuous time, too, lies before those who crowd parish work into the winter and look for the principal spiritual harvesting during these cold months. For thousands of women who are overtaxed in spring and summer, the later autumn and the winter are seasons of relief.

The days begin to lengthen, the children are in school, the outside labor is lessened and there are neither hungry hayed men nor exacting city boarders for whom to provide. Even where the summer brings none of these extra burdens, the winter days are comparatively easy going and leisurely to the women at home. They have their mothers' meetings and their pleasant social clubs where they read papers and carry on discussions. They have time for books and thought, for beginning without hurry and flurry the making over of clothes for the children and the replenishing of the household linen. Neglected correspondence with kinsfolk and friends is resumed and arrears are paid in full. What should we do but for the blessed tranquillity of those days when we sit within doors near a glowing fire, the dear ones safe under the roof enjoying the peaceful scene, although we may be encompassed by what Emerson calls a tumultuous privacy of storm? And here is a picture from Whittier:

Shut in from all the world without,
We sat the clean-winged hearth about,
Content to let the north wind roar
In baffled rage at pane and door,
While the red logs before us beat
The frost-line back with tropic heat;
And ever, with a louder blast
Shook beam and rafter as it passed,
The merrier up its gathering draught
The great throat of the chimney laughed.

What matter how the night behaved?
What matter how the north wind raved?
Blow high, blow low, not all its snow
Could quench our hearth-fire's ruddy glow.

Bravery Under Misfortune The real stuff of which people are made is displayed when they have to bear the sharp darts of misfortune. For example, a man and his wife, with a little child, worked together and saved together until they had money enough to set out for a new country. They had been moderately prosperous in the Middle West, but they had a vision of a better opportunity farther on, and so they disposed of their little holdings, packed their goods and said good-by to their neighbors. Just as they were ready to start the child was taken very ill with a contagious disease. To go was impossible. Every plan had to be changed. By the time he was well their intended departure had taken another form, and they found, as they thought, a place where they might do moderately well nearer home. Then came strenuous labor, a story of crops destroyed by hail, of cholera among the hogs, one disappointment after another, so that a mortgage could not be paid. Saddest of all, death invaded the little home, and a babe that had come to be a little sunbeam, delighting the whole household, closed its eyes and slept the sleep that knows no waking.

Here certainly is a story showing successive and accumulating disaster, enough surely to daunt the stoutest heart and sap the greatest courage. Yet, to show the white feather was not possible to these brave and resolute people. They simply met each successive calamity with lips set and hands clenched, and pressed forward, fate yet pursuing. They will yet win out and snatch victory from the jaws of defeat. They belong to the race that doesn't know when it is beaten. Bravery under repeated misfortune is one of the finest qualities human nature ever shows.

CHANTICLEER

You are a darling Chanticleer,
The very prettiest bird in town,
And Gladys, as a charioteer,
Is sure of winning great renown.

Rule Yourself A mother who in addition to training and caring for her little children is housekeeper, general manager, cook, laundress and seamstress, has certainly enough for one pair of hands and one brain to supervise and attend to. There are many such mothers in the land, and it is wonderful that they succeed as they do in the performance of their manifold tasks. To every such woman the injunction comes with force morning after morning, "rule yourself this day." Constant inquiries are made by women obviously over-burdened, as to the best methods of ruling their children. If each will earn how to rule herself, how to restrain the hasty word when she is tired, how to hope continually for the best days that are coming, how to keep her little kingdom quiet and pleasant because her dominant mood is one of cheer, half her troubles will melt away. Babies soon grow out of the helplessness of infancy. Little boys and girls love to aid mother. If mother understands the art of organizing she will, after a while, let the older children relieve her of a great deal of care. They will have their daily duties, and be it noted that boys properly taught are as skilful in making bread, washing dishes and sweeping floors as are their sisters. If our women would speak in meeting, a host of them would testify to this. But beware of scolding, nagging and slapping. It is only the ignorant, thoughtless mother who condescends to the primitive method of a word and a blow. Rule yourself, and love will help you to be ruler in the family circle.

An Innocent Pastime Popular pastimes have a way of issuing out of space and spreading from house to house and from village to village with the swift contagion of an epidemic. The chief difference is that measles, whooping cough, mumps and scarlet fever are intensely to be dreaded, while an innocent and amusing novelty in the line of recreation awaits an eager welcome. The present absorption in the jig-saw puzzle has its amusing side. Old men and women, young people and children, busy house-mothers, clerks behind counters, maids in the kitchen, merchants in the counting-room, and probably kings and queens in the intervals of their royal functions, are finding entertainment in this diversion. Here and there a clever girl or boy earns many an honest penny by using his or her jig-saw in the cutting of pictures into innumerable tiny pieces that seem to have no relation one to another. Anybody who likes may mount any picture he chooses on thin wood and cut it up for friends to distract themselves with. A puzzle of this sort sometimes enlists the attention of a family or a group of interested people a whole evening and far into the night. Some jig-saw puzzles last over days. Men humorously complain that their socks are undarned and their dinners delayed, yet they do not rise superior to the temptations of the puzzle. Suburban tea parties are formed with the jig-saw as the motive for the invitation, the mails carry the puzzles back and forth as they do other parcels, and friends loan them to one another on a system of exchange. This innocent pastime has lent a new charm to the winter season.

Penny Wise and Pound Foolish This familiar phrase, like many another, encloses a kernal of wisdom in a nutshell. Among the housewives who read this page from week to week there are those who make it their boast that they never give up until they drop in their tracks; that they keep on working after they have had intimations that their strength is failing, and that they never have a doctor until they are absolutely confined to their beds. These good women tell one with satisfaction that when they are ill in earnest it is an affair of weeks or months, and they point with a certain pride to this or that attack that frightened the family and made deep inroads on the savings in the bank. Why would it not have been truer economy and more in line with common sense to stop before getting so weary that nature refused to be longer challenged? Why not, particularly when menaced with cold or rheumatism or some other device of the demon of ill health, take steps at once to ward off the trouble?

THE CAT "BEAUTIFUL"

By SUSAN E. W. JOCELYN

CHARLES HORTON, a dignified bachelor of five and thirty, well dressed and not unmindful of his good appearance, awaited the arrival of his little niece at the railroad station. Plans for the relief of possible homesickness in his young visitor filled his mind.

"Shall I buy a Teddy bear for her?" he thought, then smiled as he pictured the probable indignation of the small maiden at being presented with so babyish a plaything.

Just then the up train came steaming in, and while he stood waiting for its departure, his eye was attracted by something unusual on the engine. Curled up on the cross beam was a fine sleek cat, in full evening dress, black coat, white shirt front and gloves. As the engineer put out his hand to capture it, the strange traveler arose, and arching its back as if getting its bearings, gave a quick glance at the faces near it, then, without a mew of explanation, sprang towards the astonished Mr. Horton and rubbed a furry cheek against the bearded one, to the surprise and amusement of the bystanders.

The next instant, filtering through the boisterous hilarity of the moment, came the words, "Beautiful! Oh, Beautiful!" uttered in a voice of caressing sweetness, silver clear, yet softened by a note of such tender compassion that a confiding paw was stretched quickly towards a small gloved hand appearing above the bachelor's shoulder, making a complication which rendered that gentleman's movements restricted and the situation doubly embarrassing. Then came the words:

"Oh, papa, see, see! If I were only on the way home, it should be my very own." And the magical voice came stealing dangerously near.

"Now, Rose, don't be foolish," interposed a heavy masculine voice. "Come; we must hurry. The carriage is waiting."

As Charles Horton gave a furtive, backward glance, he caught the glimpse of a vanishing skirt and the tilt of a sailor hat over sun-kissed hair. In another moment a good-by was waved to the friendly animal, and eyes, wistful with interest, looked straight into those of its protector, who with sudden impulse raised his hat slightly, a gallantry apparently unnoticed. Reddening at his own audacity, he strode forward to meet the incoming train and deposited his burden in the arms of his astonished little niece.

"Why, Uncle Charlie, it's just like a fairy tale!" she cried as she listened to the story of its coming.

"Even to the fairy godmother," he assented. "She popped out of the crowd a moment ago, christened it 'Beautiful,' and then vanished as quickly as she came. We must keep you, puss, and call you Beautiful, Aunt Bess' opinion to the contrary perhaps, for bad luck always attends disobedience to fairy god-mothers."

Before the sun went down that day, this black, velvety creature had made himself at home in the bachelor's garden, through that never-failing attraction, warm milk. Perched on the roof of the little arbor among the clematis vines, he placidly surveyed his surroundings with curious eyes, while the unusual occurrence at the station was discussed by the family and kitty in the flesh was for a moment forgotten.

Suddenly, through the flower-scented air came the words, "Sweet, sweetest, sweet, oh sweet!" in a perfect gush of trills.

"Hear that?" cried Aunt Bess. "It must be Mrs. Garland's niece. She can imitate a bird to perfection, and I believe she was expected to-day."

Uncle Charlie listened entranced, until a quick scrambling among the clematis vines brought to him a sense of impending trouble, and he sprang up as away dashed Beautiful over the fence, through the intervening gardens to the singer. Away also dashed Charles Horton in pursuit, regardless of fences and flower beds, nor did he abate his mad chase until he stood, flushed and foolish-looking, by the window through which the lively feline had sprung and was now quietly crouching beside the fairy godmother, its topaz eyes fixed enquiringly on hers.

"Oh, please," she sang, with a swift, beseeching glance, "don't disturb us, just yet—just yet," and she chirped on, "Sweet, sweetest, sweet, oh sweet!"

"'Don't disturb us just yet—just yet,' she said"

Under the spell of music and embarrassment, he stood in silence for a moment, then suddenly cried out in alarm, "Don't, don't! It's too birdlike. I'm afraid he'll spring."

"Oh, there's no danger. We've met before," she added, coming forward with the cat in her arms, smoothing its fur and praising its eyes. "They are so tender," she said, looking down into the yellow pools, and when, after much caressing, she deposited him in his master's arms, it was with the hope expressed that he would often mistake her for a bird. "It's the greatest compliment I ever had," she said, as Horton, cat in hand, bowed and backed his way off the piazza, thereby postponing as long as possible a display of torn trousers, which must inevitably be brought to view on the home stretch; and the graceful agility with which he vaulted fences on his way was calculated to divert attention from such trivial matters—at least, he was vain enough to hope so.

With the cause of all this commotion safe within the confines of the garden, Horton's thoughts took a romantic turn, and he almost wished she had not been quite so self-possessed. He didn't feel self-possessed—not the least bit in the world—when he thought of that exhibition of torn trousers. It was not an agreeable subject for reflection. He would change it (along with the trousers) for something more pleasing—the fairy godmother herself as she sat at the piano, glints of blue under long lashes, white throat, and red lips parted as "Sweet, sweetest, sweet, oh sweet!" came thrilling through them; but it was like trying to remember a dream, delightful and elusive, and a summons to supper brought him to a sudden sense of things temporal, especially as he observed a newly arrived guest, an elderly clergyman, dispose of the substantial repast.

In his way, a good man was the Reverend Hiram Matthews, and he made a point of returning thanks after breaking bread with his friends. On this occasion he arose from the table, grasped the back of his chair, placed one knee on the seat, inclined his body forward in reverent position and, commencing in an ordinary tone, started on an invocation that waxed in power as it proceeded until the teacups fairly rattled with the reverberation.

Beautiful, peacefully sleeping in t corner, opened one yellow eye, t the other, while both ears stood up a listened. Slowly he arose, arching back and yawning. Approaching impromptu altar, he sat down, looki upward. Further investigation see ing necessary, he ventured one paw the rung of the chair. Its mate f lowed quickly, and, in upright po tion, he stood with glittering e fixed in mute inquiry upon the hum towering above him until a startli burst of eloquence brought forth duet a dismally lengthened "M-e-o-w

A terrible explosion rent the air, bursting of the vials of wrath, f lowed by a wildly hissed "Scat!" a the hurling of the Reverend Hira sole weapon of defense, a pocket co With one bound the panic-stricl kitten was out the door. Regardl of obstacles, he dashed into the str scrabbling between the slender feet the fairy godmother, who was str ing in the twilight by way of famili izing herself with the neighborho its manners and customs. Natura the antics of the frantic cat threw little French-heeled slippers quite their balance, so that Horton, in pursuit, collided heavily with their t pling wearer. What could he do clasp the swaying figure for an inst in his arms before rushing onw still in pursuit, calling, "Beautif Oh, Beautiful!"

Beautiful, a-tremble, had tal refuge on Miss Mehitable Jen piazza, where that ancient maiden quietly sipping her tea. There wa general upset. Miss Mehitable, s that the cat was mad, screamed lust for aid and then grew hysteri Again the bachelor's strong arms w brought into requisition.

As he trudged soberly homewa panting charge in close embrace, H ton's downcast eye observed a dimi tive slipper, sparkling with buck and beads, wedged between curb a pavement.

"All in keeping," he murmured puss. "Fairy godmothers, glass sl pers. We'll act it out to the end a go in search of our Cinderella."

He felt some misgiving as to propriety of his conduct as he nea the house harboring this creature romance. It was not quite clear him in what way he had failed, but was quite sure that he had done so thing wrong when, as he advanc the godmother arose stiffly fr her seat, bowed ceremoniously a thanked him in cool, measured to for his assistance, thereby dispelli all thoughts of Cinderella pleasantri He was sorry he had not sent t foolish little slipper by messeng Fumbling in his pocket for it, he m aged to express his regrets with gra courtesy, albeit he could scarcely f bear a smile at the nervous tens with which she held her skirt over t unshod foot.

"Beautiful makes his apologies," said as he turned to go; "but he ne sympathy—as does his master. It h been a trying day for both."

"Beautiful? Beautiful? Is that l name?" she questioned, her eyes w with surprise. "It is I who sho apologize." With cheeks warm w blushes and eyes falling before his, s faltered with a tremulous laugh, thought—I thought, out there in t street, when you—— Forgive me, thought you were being rude——" sliber. "I am looking for a mate," he concluded, and colored at his inanity.

"Was it for that you were waiting at the station?" Adding mischievously, "And found a cat."

"I found Beautiful," was the significant answer as he relieved her of the animal which had bounded to her shoulder, and bade her adieu with the prophecy that, with such an arbitrator, peace should reign forever between the house of Garland and the house of Horton.

For the next few days, no subject interested the Horton family to such a extent as this wonderful cat. For all their loving care he showed much appreciation, manifesting no disposition to roam except as the birdlike voice allured him, when he was sure to follow a follower. He seemed to need no special training and his one weakness, the determination to nap just wherever he pleased, seemed too pretty a trait to attract unfavorable notice. Each day brought marked indication of his hold on the family affections.

"How did we ever live without you, Beautiful? and you, too, Gracie?" laughed Uncle Charlie one evening as the three were enjoying their customary romp in the garden where Aunt Bess and Miss Garland had joined them. "The Children's Hour," he called this especial time.

"We should never have known Beautiful if it had not been for Gracie," joined Aunt Bess. "You brought good luck, dear," drawing the little niece closer.

"And if it hadn't been for Beautiful, you wouldn't have known Miss Rose," laughed Gracie. "That's good luck, too. You couldn't live without her either, could you, Uncle Charlie?—she's so pink and so pretty."

Fast changing from pink to red, Miss Garland took advantage of Beautiful's frolicsome mood to hide her embarrassment. Skipping to and fro time with his gambols, she chattered:

"We'll call Beautiful our mascot, Gracie, and for good luck your uncle must give us each his picture in a locket when we go away—the cat's picture, I mean," in confusion.

Uncle Charlie's face also had taken on an extra ruddy tint. He, too, turned to Beautiful for help. Aunt Bess considerately gave her attention to a refractory vine.

One morning, not long after, Horton, immaculate in summer traveling attire, swinging his suit case cheerily, was accosted near his door step by the dainty Miss Garland on her way to a morning concert.

"Going away? How can you bear to leave Beautiful?"

"It is hard to leave so much that's beautiful," gallantly, his eyes resting for a moment on the radiant face beside him.

They waited at the corner for a car. She turned to him suddenly.

"What was that? It sounds like Beautiful. I'm sure it was his mew. Where can he be?"

Perplexed, she looked this way and that, while her companion, regardless of light trousers, dropped his suit case, and crouching low, applied his ear to the ground.

"Mr. Horton! Mr. Horton! It's here in your suit case! Oh, oh, oh! Come quickly!"

Unmindful of delicate gloves, she struggled with buckles and straps. Then ensued much excited searching through various pockets for the key, a final wrenching of prison bars, and out sprang Beautiful, wild-eyed and trembling, his track scattered with the numerous belongings of a society man.

The car, meanwhile, had passed unheeded, its occupants hilarious at the exhibition on the sidewalk. Horton, with a section of brilliantly striped pajamas dangling from one hand, a rubber shoe in the other, was pursuing a shaving cup and collar box on their way to the gutter.

Miss Garland, her dainty white linen streaked with dust, her gloves torn, shuddered at the thought of Beautiful's peril.

"Oh, you poor darling!" she cried, and then as a glance of inquiry flashed back at her, she seized the frightened animal, and, hiding her scarlet face in the furry coat, sped down the street toward its home.

Left to himself, the perturbed bachelor captured what he could of his absconding possessions and thrust them into the suit case, hailing the next car—one going in an opposite direction from his intended course—and started for he knew not where.

A week later, when Horton greeted his family, no shade of annoyance lingered on his countenance. "'With all thy faults, I love thee still,'" he cried as Beautiful sprang to his shoulder and rubbed a fervent welcome. Later, in the moonlit garden, under the clematis blossoms with Rose, he listened with rapturous attention to her recital of Beautiful's enchanting ways acquired during his absence.

"You still call him your mascot?" smiling, as he slipped the good luck locket into her hand. "He shall be my mascot, too, if he'll bring his bird to me."

"Oh, the dear!" she laughed, looking at the little pictured face. "'None knew thee but to love thee.'"

"'Love my cat, love me?'" he asked with sudden earnestness.

In silence the pretty head bent over the locket.

"No answer?" wistfully.

"Oh that my eyes could speak like these," she whispered.

"Look up, that I may judge," he said, and waited—then——

"Beautiful! Oh, my beautiful!" he cried.

"Me-o-w!" answered Beautiful.

Burned His Magical Books

CUH-FI-HUNG was a very successful fortune-teller in Wuchow, China. His father and grandfather before him had followed the same profession, and these books, of considerable value in the profession, had been handed down from generation to generation. Cuh heard the Gospel and was prevailed upon to come to the meetings. He was a proud man, and though he had read a good deal of the Gospel books and was favorably impressed, yet he did not yield to Christ. Finally, the Spirit conquered and he accepted the Saviour.

Shortly before his baptism, he came to the missionary in considerable perplexity about what he should do with the books. He said:

"How can I sell them or even give them away, lest they might lose another's soul as they all but lost mine."

The missionary referred him to Acts 19: 18, 19 and read, "Many also of them that had believed came, confessing and declaring their deeds. And not a few of them that practised magical arts brought their books together and burned them in the sight of all."

Cuh at once determined that he would do the same thing on the day of his baptism. On that day a company of fellow-Christians, students and missionaries gathered in the court of the mission premises, and made a bonfire around which they sang praises to the name of Jesus, while Cuh, with his own hands, burned the magical volumes to ashes.
